The death of dating

Whatever happened to the traditional date that my parents talked about? Their stories about dinner at car hops followed by a drive–in movies have fascinated me, but have left me wondering what has happened to this once–cherished pastime of dating?

Mike Burke

Has dating gone the way of the dinosaurs, for a faster, less–personal "hook–up?" Is dating too personal, too slow for the fast paced '90s where we want everything NOW? The weekend college scene is all too familiar: get drunk, get horny, find stranger/remote friend, hit the sack. Ever noticed how often the term "hook–up" pops up in Monday morning conversation? Maybe I am a bit old–fashioned, but this sounds much less romantic than watching an Audrey Hepburn movie in a 1956 Chevy at a drive–in.

But today there seem so few alternatives to meeting potential dates/partners/lovers/what ever. The problem has escalated to the point where you either partake in the hook– up scene or you stay single. Where has the middle ground gone? Here are a few options:

• Follow Ma Burke's (my grandmother's) advice — date a lot of different people. This may have been cool during the Depression, but now you will probably be quickly labeled either a "player" or a "slut" depending on your gender. I doubt Ma Burke wants her grandson to be considered a "player."

In theory, this option could be great. But the word "commitment" has become linked with "first date" far too quickly these days.

• Spend Saturday nights alone. Seems like the easy way out but pretty soon you will find yourself humming along to R.E.M.'s "Everybody Hurts," swearing Michael Stipe wrote the song for you.

• Listen to your friends when they say that dating is dead. Sounds good doesn't it? Then you realize these same friends a) are on the verge of marriage, b) have no chance of ever finding a date, or c)

Looking for perfection

[illegible]'ve seen couples [illegible]erywhere, from the basement of the Campus Center to the dining commons to the tables of the Bluewall. And depending on the couple, you're either turned green with envy, or just made nauseatingly sick.

Seema Gangatirkar

There are those couples who cannot keep their hands off of each other for more than [illegible] seconds. Their public [illegible]plays of affection [illegible]mpt you to look the other way.

On the other hand, there are the "ideal" couples — couples who have formulated the perfect combination of love and friendship.

"I don't just love him, I like him. I really like him," Jenny Adams said of her fiancé, Ethan Powers. "Even if he wasn't my fiancé, I would spend time with him."

Adams, a political science major at Three Rivers College in Norwich, Conn., and Powers, a double English and film studies major at UMass, met in high school, but did not start to date until after graduation.

"We had been friends and then we started to go out," Adams said. "We'd have lunch together every day."

Last Christmas, they took the first step towards marriage. "We knew pretty early that we wanted to spend the rest of our lives together," Adams said. "Becoming engaged was the first celebration."

Of course, before any couple contemplates a golden future together, the initial step must be taken. That's right, the first date — equivalent to the stress of six computer science finals all taken on the same day.

Accompanying Adams and Powers on their first date included Adams' two teenage brothers, their two best friends, and her mother.

"It was quite a scene," Powers recalled.

A blizzard almost snowed out Jean Foster and Sean Carter's first date.

"I didn't want to go," Foster said. "I was scared of the snow and I thought we'd get into a car accident and crash. But I went anyway."

Looking back on that date at Spaghetti Freddy's, Carter said that the experience was "very nice, very awkward."

And of course, following the first date — assuming

The joys of Cybersex

Nymph kisses Hawk as she runs her hands across his rippling biceps. She slowly moves her hands further down his body, allowing her long red nails to tickle him.

Hawk runs his hands through Nymph's long flowing hair. The pair collapses on to a bed of moss in the middle of an airy forest glade.

The above lines are not from a Harlequin romance novel, but from two Internet users engaging in a somewhat common Internet ritual known as cybersex.

Did you know that people have sex over the Internet?

It is not like those virtual reality scenes in Aerosmith videos or the movie, The Lawnmower Man. Nonetheless, it is sex. Actually it really is not sex since the people are not in physical contact, but that is a simple technicality.

When two people engage in cybersex, they are basically talking dirty across the Internet.

Do not jump to conclusions — cybersex is not pornography. Despite what you might believe, there is a dramatic difference between the two. Pornography is not an act between two consenting adults who interact with each other, but cybersex is. Cybersex partners must agree to engage in the activity.

Now that we understand the basic differences between the two, it is time to get down and dirty about cybersex.

There are a few different places where you can take part in the Internet's racier side. The first stop is Internet Relay Chat, commonly known as IRC.

IRC is a real time discussion forum where users from across the globe meet and talk about anything, including sex. However, sex chat group users usually do not talk dirty to each other — instead they simply flirt or hold regular discussions.

A better place to randomly hook up, like in a singles bar, are social MUDs. MUDs — short for multi-user dimensions — originally were created to play Dungeons and Dragons on-line, but they've come a long way since their creation.

Social MUDs, unlike the gaming variety, are designed as an alternative to the crowded world of IRC. One such MUD with an atmosphere of a singles' bar is Nails (telnet nails.k2- nesoft.com 5150).

Players on social MUDs sometimes simply log in looking for cybersex and nothing more.

However, use caution when cruising these two systems, because things are not what they seem on the surface. Some times the person on the other end is a crossdresser. It is quite common for men to portray women on these sites.

While on Nails, I asked a few users whether they knew of on-line cross-dressers, and they responded by saying it is quite common. One male user confessed that he had a second character that is female. A few female users said they dabbled in cross-dressing on at least one occasion.

Having second thoughts about cybersex?

There are other systems that are more personalized, so users know the real sex of their partner. However, these potentially more secure opportunities demand a higher powe- red computer system that has software like Netscape's Cool Talk.

Cool Talk allows users to actually talk with each other, assuming the users have a sound card and microphone. Most users attach a photo image of themselves to the program when they are corresponding. This form of cybersex is more like phone sex, as it adds the allure of voice.

If talking with your partner is not enough to arouse your interests, then there is another technology that few users have: CuSeeMe.

Not only must users have a microphone and soundcard, but they need a digital camera attached to their PC to use this technology.

Through CuSeeMe, people can literally watch each other while engaging in cybersex. It might possibly be the next best thing to being there.

However, nothing can compete with the real thing.

The burden of cyberlove

Lisa M. Oliveri

He went by the user name DMS. All in capitals, forcing other members of the chat room to take notice. He was always on-line, waiting to make a witty remark, or to sprout lines from his favorite poem. He was captivating, yet sincere. When he wasn't there the chat room seemed empty, and other members would always post the same message, "When is DMS going to be on?"

As a first-time user of the Internet, I often observed this strange creature — a nameless, faceless person whom everybody liked so much. I was afraid to post messages, afraid that more experienced members would chide me, and more importantly, that DMS would think me stupid. Hours went by when I would just linger in the background, hoping for a moment that we would be the only two on-line.

Then finally, one Tuesday morning, my wish came true. I booted up my computer, fired up Netscape and went to the first bookmark on my list. And there he was. Alone. Waiting for someone to talk to. His first message: 8 a.m. — Hello? Anybody there. No Reply. Second message: 8:05 a.m. — Anybody out there? No Reply. Third message: 8:11 a.m. — some profound words of poetry that escape my mind at the moment. It was as if he was waiting just for me. Here was my moment to impress this enigma. Now was the time to get to know DMS.

I typed in my message, a meek "hello" followed by my name. I'm not sure if I was expecting him to write something nasty, something to the extent of, "Who are you? And why do you think I will talk to you?" After all, he was the "big man on the chat line" so to speak. But instead I got a hearty "Hello, how are you? Tell me about yourself. Where are you from?"

He actually wanted to talk to me.

This whole scenario reminded me of days spent in high school as a freshman, when I would look at the upperclassmen and think they were so great. I would build them up so much in my mind that I was way too nervous to talk to them. But when I did, they really were not as exciting or as mystical as I thought. They were ordinary men. As was DMS.

We talked for over an hour alone that Tuesday morning, uninterrupted by meaningless chatter from other members. I soon found out that DMS was short for Dog Man Star, but never learned what that stood for. We got to know each other as best as two people on a computer can. His real name was Stephen, he was from Scotland, and was presently enrolled in a college in England.

Now while this may not have been the ideal situation for developing a relationship, getting to know someone on-line has its advantages. For one, it's possible to know the real person; since both people are unable to see each other, there's no opportunity to be shallow. You also don't have to worry about impressing your friends. And you don't have to wonder if your clothes are the right style or if your having a bad hair day. To have an on-line date, you don't even need to get ready — you can sit at your computer in your pajamas eating ice cream — since your on-line lover really only cares about your personality.

Stephen and I quickly became fond of one another, and were immersed in our own world even as others entered the chat room. But everyone knew that we were "the couple," and no one asked us any questions because they knew we just wanted to talk to one another. We even tried at times to enter private chat rooms, but unfortunately I was extremely WWW illiterate and was unable to do so. When I wasn't talking to him I was sad, and he often sent me grand messages, pining for my love.

After weeks of cyberlove Stephen and I agreed to call one another. He gave me his phone number and we agreed on a specific time, certain that we would both be available. I remember moments up to that phone call, my palms sweating, my thoughts full of anticipation. When we finally spoke it was as grandiose as I imagined. We were both at ease and just glad to hear each other's voice.

It was much easier to talk on-line because now I at least had a voice to associate with the writing. Our relationship became stronger, we were closer than we had ever been. Until that one fateful day.

JENNIFER JUTRAS / COLLEGIAN

Campus love...
Young couple walked to class together yesterday afternoon.

At the time of our cyber-dating, I didn't own a personal computer and all of our "dates" were taking place from my workplace, a company where I was film editing. Much to my boss' dismay, my trusty Powermac was getting more action than she ever would, so she fired me. Just like that. At 5 p.m. on a Friday afternoon, she asked me for the keys to my desk, and then asked me not to return. My relationship was over.

I didn't get to talk to Stephen much after that, for lack of a computer. I tried to go to the library a few times, but the closest one with Internet access was 25 minutes away, and even then there was a limit as to how long I could use it.

So was this the ideal relationship? Probably not. But taken with a grain of salt, cyberlove can be a fun experience. No, the keyboard does not substitute for the feel of human flesh, and there is definitely something lacking in a relationship where partners never meet.

Stephen was my first and only cyber love. Somehow, nothing can capture the excitement of that first message, the first phone call, the first time hearing his voice. DMS is now only a fond memory.

Bars and dating, the mixed drink from hell

Tara MK Connelly

Dating and bars seem to go hand in hand. But in actuality, meeting people in bars in order to get a date is neigh near impossible, not to mention cheesy sounding and highly unlucrative lovewise.

The bar scene in Amherst is really a laughable place to meet a significant other. For any of you who have actually been in a bar on the weekends, you know what I mean. Places like Delano's, Barsie's, and The Pub become so congested with people willing to fritter away good money on a hangover, that walking into these places becomes the first challenge.

The next is weaving your way precariously between throngs of people yelling, spilling beverages on you, and trying to smoke. Beware of those morons trying to smoke — they hold their flaming cancer torches at odd angels and many an item of clothing, not to mention human appendage, has been "oops, sorry about that!" scorched. Yeah, oops, sorry, now who's going to pay for my trip to the Mass. General burn center?

I guess if you call rubbing up against someone "meeting" them, then you "meet" lots of people. In fact you "meet" lots of people, some of whom you wish had never been born (cruel, but haven't we all been harassed by that person who just needs a clue?). I especially like to "meet" the guys who feel it necessary to squeeze past you and check for bodily harm on the trip by. Yes, that was my butt you "accidently" grabbed — why couldn't I have been smoking? Honestly, if the only way you can get some action is by rubbing up against women in bars, maybe you should consider changing your species to dog — not only will you be able to hump things like fire hydrants and mailboxes, but girls might think what your doing is cute.

It's not only men in bars who go beyond the mating call of duty — plenty of women debase themselves. Once I was in Delano's, (again) trying to get one of the two bartenders' attention, when I felt someone's hip smack into my shoulder. Turns out this sorority girl (I know she was from one because I used to live next door to her and her "sistas") was grinding — I mean grinding — her, uh, derriere into the lap of this, ah, gentleman who looked like he was about to — well, you know. I tried to ignore it, but the Mistress of Desire kept bumping into me. The sick thing was that her friends were laughing and egging her on (as if she needed any encouragement).

The same goes for this couple at the Pub who made the lambada look like the chicken dance. If you put a stalk of wheat between them, I swear you'd get flour. I know that the Pub's dance floor isn't very big, so a little body contact is inevitable, but these two took the cake. You don't mean to stare at these people, but you find your eyes drifting to them and, well, staring. You're horrified and fascinated — I guess that's why Faces of Death made so much money.

I think I would even go as far as to say that bars are the least popular way to meet people because of the "meat market" reputation, the over crowding, the drunken masses, and the fact that any conversation is practically impossible. Of course you could go to a bar on a non-busy day, but that cuts your "potential" even more.

As a cocktail waitress I have seen weak and pitiful attempts, made mostly by men, at bars and they doesn't work. You see them make some half-hearted attempt and then slink away in defeat. Never approach a girl with a lot of friends because you will get ripped apart by each and every one of them even before you garner the courage to go to the table. They will see the furtive glances and spark of interest light up your eye, and you will immediately become their topic of conversation.

The same goes for a girl. Guys will put a girl down in a heartbeat just to get a few chuckles from his pals. They will analyze first your butt, then your chest, and if they are in a good mood, your face. They will talk shop and then some until you feel as big as your little finger. And they will then go on to talk about just what they'd like to do with that little finger — nice, huh?

Now, if you mean meeting people in a more "real" bar with people focused more on getting to know a person than getting know a person biblically, that is another story and a whole other column.

Finding a date is hard enough without a noisy bar getting in the way. How many people have seen the glow of love through vodka-colored glasses only to wish someone had dropped them the morning after? With all this commotion going on, I'd save dates for the standard dinner and a movie for first-time subscribers. Once you get to know each other better, drag them into a den of inequity and, for God's sake, have mercy on us all and don't lambada!

Safe dating: a guide to protection in the real world

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Staff

Dating these days is more than a scary thing. It can be risky, and potentially life threatening.

The primary dangers of dating for females include sexual harassment, date rape and acquaintance rape. Dating dangers, regardless of gender, include results of unprotected sex like sexually transmitted diseases and risk of pregnancy, which affects both partners.

Dating violence is an all too common occurrence on college campuses. According to Sarah Fernstermaker's Violence in Dating Relationships: Emerging Social Issues, 25 to 51 percent of females reported sexually coercive experiences during one academic year. Four to 15 percent of males have engaged in behavior legally defined as rape.

Dating violence occurs most frequently between parties who know or have seen each other prior to the incident. Most assailants have seen their victims at least once, according to Fernstermaker.

"A vast majority of these acts involved men and women who were acquainted," she wrote.

Acquaintance rape, according to the American College Health Association, is "when someone you know forces you to have sexual intercourse against your will — whether you are passed out, too drunk to refuse, too scared to argue, or for some other reason do not give consent."

According to national surveys, one in four women have experienced rape or attempted rape since the age of 14. Nine in 10 acquaintance rapes are not reported. One in 12 college men admit to acts that meet legal definitions of rape, yet few of these men identify themselves as rapists.

Dating Violence: Prevalence, Context and Risk Markers, by David B. Sugarman and Gerald T. Hotaling, suggests "the primary cause of their violence was to 'intimidate,' 'frighten,' or 'force the other person to give me something.'"

Rape is about power and anger. Often, a man rapes to overpower or express anger at a woman — to get back at her, according to the American College Health Association.

Dating and relationships not only involve knowing your partner or prospective date/boyfriend/girlfriend, but also knowing where they have been and who they have been with.

According to a study done at the University of Indiana by Douglas J. Besharov, author of Risks and Realism, Teen Sex, only 50 percent of reported partners had used condoms.

"Risk takers" made up 27 percent, which are considered alcohol and drug users. A study done at the University of Maryland cited statistics for reasons women did not use contraceptives.

"I knew it was risky, but I took a chance"(62 percent), "I didn't think I'd have sex at the time"(56 percent), "I'm not very sexually active"(46 percent). Susan Davis, Contraception Counselor at the Washington, D.C. Planned Parenthood Office, found that many Americans do not think "it is right to be prepared for casual sex," especially for women.

"It has to do with a puritanical society," Davis said.

If sex is unplanned, or, more importantly, unprotected, the danger of dating becomes very real.

Sexually transmitted diseases or venereal diseases include various infections transmitted through sexual contact in which body fluids are shared. Some STDs are more communicable than others, some cannot be cured, and all of them can be transmitted even when a person has no symptoms. A person may be infected with the same STD more than once because immunity is rare, according to a pamphlet distributed by University Health Services.

STDs include AIDS-HIV, chlamydia, genital or venereal warts, gonorrhea, hepatitis A and B, herpes and syphilis. The best way to prevent STDs is abstinence.

To avoid STDs, people must practice safe sex, know their partners, be honest with each other, and visit their physicians frequently.

GLBT staff explores love on a semi-straight campus

GLBT Staff

Everyone has different dating stories. Whether they are horror stories or wonderful "love at first sight" stories, you all have a story to tell. In the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender (GLBT) world, dating can often become a strange and hard experience to come by. Here are three stories from three different people sharing their dating experiences with all of you:

Amy's story:

Many people have persisted in asking me how I met my girlfriend, Kristen. There are millions of misconceptions that lead most people to think that the gay community has some sort of secret source that matches us up with our mates. I actually spoke to a young woman once who tried to chase down a car that was loudly playing Ani Difranco in an attempt to meet a girl. I wouldn't recommend this technique, but I also can't say that I have thought of anything so clever.

I ran into one of my old high school friends at work one day, and we went through the motions of one of those "let's get together sometime soon" moments. To my undying gratefulness, this was one of those rare times that it actually worked out. When we spoke, he told me that his friend would be joining us for dinner.

If I may properly quote him, he felt obliged to inform me, prior to meeting her, that she "likes girls." I laughed inside, thinking he was assuming I'd be intimidated. Little did he know, but I was quite looking forward to the evening for purposes more than just spending time with an old friend.

I have noticed it's significantly harder to (pardon the pun) come out and ask for a date. Fortunately enough in my case, I didn't have to. Kristen and I spent a majority of the night talking, and we have now been together for three months.

Amongst fears and hesitancy, I am confident enough to say that there is a special someone out there for everyone. man or woman. Gay, straight, bisexual... whatever. I've come to the point in my life where I realize that love is

Tribe Called Quest to hit MHC

COURTESY CHRISTIAN LANTRY

A Tribe Called Quest trips into Mount Holyoke College tonight.

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

"Linden Boulevard Represent, Represent. Tribe Called Quest Represent, Represent." If you heed that call, then you already have your ticket to see Tribe Called Quest at Mt. Holyoke College on Thursday night. If you haven't stopped sleeping, wake up, and join the rest of the hip–hop community.

Tribe Called Quest first garnered the attention of the hip– hop world in 1990 with their debut album, People's Instinctive Travels and The Paths of Rhythm. That album debuted the smoother–than–butter vocal delivery of Q–Tip the Abstract Poet, the hyperness of Phife Dog, and the turntable skills of Ali–Shaheed Muhammed. Songs like, "I Left My Wallet In El Segundo," "Bonita Applebum" and "Can I Kick It" prove that a hip–hop group with skills could flow on some random tip without sounding like a gimmick. While the first album was a fun one, Q–Tip and Phife proved that they were not to be trifled with.

Only a year later, Tribe blew up the hip–hop world with Low End Theory. If you had a clue and a pulse at one time in your life, you know at least a couple of lines from the hit single, "Scenario," a collaboration with the leaders of the new school. Tribe Called Quest managed to put out an album that both blew up the pop charts, and still appeared on almost every DJ's mix tape. Transcending the bounds between real hip–hop and commercialism, Tribe Called Quest proved they were loved by all.

When most of the hip–hop world was busy going the gangster rout, rapping about guts, blunts, and 'hos, Tribe Called Quest turned the other cheek and released Midnight Marauders in 1993. While the album took over the radio waves, hit singles like "Award Tour," "Oh My God" and "Sucka Nigga" showed Tribe turning their third eye on the black community.

Finally after a three–year wait, Tribe has blessed us with their fourth album, Beats, Rhymes, and Life. This time Q– Tip, Phife and Ali–Shaheed are all business. Taking out everyone from phony rappers to west coast/east coast battlers, from the record industry to those who put down women, Tribe showed they're for real.

Tribe flows so smoothly on Beats, Rhymes, and Life that it is easy to miss out on the messages. Tribe comes across like a lazy Sunday, mixing the beats with the vocals in such a manner that they become like one lifting the listener to a higher plane. On the album, Q–Tip claims that "hip–hop can't teach you how to raise a family or treat a wife." However when a group is on point like Tribe, you believe they could.

When you go see Tribe Called Quest, you will see a group that is not about fronts or using MTV to succeed. This is a group that is popular because no matter what the flavor of the month is, they are always above it. There have been better MCs and better albums released than those by Tribe, but only KRS–One has consistently released albums embraced by both the commercial and the hip–hop world. Tribe is here forever — appreciate it.

Tribe Called Quest will be appearing at Chapin Hall at Mt. Holyoke College on Thursday, Oct. 10 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $17.50 in advance.

Redman hits groove on Freedom

Jazz' brightest young saxophonist set to light up the Iron Horse

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

JOSHUA REDMAN
Freedom In The Groove
Warner Bros

Hailed as a "genius" by jazz veteran Michael Brecker and crowned the "prince of the tenor saxophone" by the Associated Press, Joshua Redman is definitely seeing new heights to his career. His new fifth album, Freedom..., on which all songs are his originals, shows him building on top of previous efforts that positioned him with the rest of the currently artistically stale (for the most part) jazz scene prevalent nowadays.

Not that this new effort is another Kind of Blue or any sort of revolutionary jazz album, but it still maintains a current that flows through it, demanding attention. There are some completely beautiful moments here. "One Shining Soul," the album's second cut, glides on a calm–ocean feel that is elicited by the beautiful theme, stated by Redman on soprano, with Peter Martin on piano and Peter Bernstein on guitar. The song goes on to present a fiery piano solo by Martin, who has only been working with Redman for a year.

The true high point of this album comes late in the CD, with "Pantomime." Everybody in the ensemble (Redman, Martin, Bernstein, backed rhythmically by Brian Blade on drums and Chris Thomas on bass) truly works together to bring the band as an institution to moments of climax that in other circumstances would provoke marriage.

As there is "groove" in the title, one would expect sincere soulful funk or general consistency of some danceable rhythm that defines groove. The compositions "Cat Battles," "Can't Dance" and "Hide & Seek" are where this groove is truly located. They all encompass the bastion of soul that one could easily get away with playing at a party and getting a fair amount of open–minded dancers on a floor. "Hide & Seek" has a blues feel; "Cat Battles," while not being very danceable, still maintains a grooving rhythm due to its melodic lingering; and "Can't Dance" closes out the CD with outright soul–jazz.

Filler on this CD consists of "Dare I Ask," which follows the hard bop formula — from the '50s Prestige albums of Sonny Rollins, Miles Davis and others — that all too many jazz musicians nowadays lazily stick to. "Home Fries" is interesting with its small combo sound and big band feel, but lumbers along uninterestingly, and seems to have been put on the CD to give the listener almost seventy minutes of music.

So, all in all, this CD was put together with a definite feel in mind, but with the calmness of "One Shining Soul," the elevated feel of "Pantomime," and the straight groove of the three soulful, danceable tunes mentioned above. This CD gives the cynical '90s jazz listener a break from the boredom and album–long formulas that inprison an artist's sound rather than give it freedom, which Redman and his band have done. A–

The Joshua Redman Quintet will be performing Oct. 14 at the Iron Horse at 7 & 10 p.m. Tickets are $22.50. Call the Iron Horse at 584–0610 for more information.

Noho's Humbert making the big time

By Ray Keenen
Collegian Correspondent

When the Iron Horse advertises their show this Friday, they are going to have a tough time describing what Humbert actually is. Named after Humbert Humbert, the central character of Nabokov's Lolita, the Northampton quartet has been described as a mix of lounge, jazz, punk, janglepop, surf rock and yes, even a little hardcore. No matter how they are classified, they definitely are original.

The group consisting of Ari Vais and Tony Westcott on vocals, guitars and songwriting, Paul Pelis on drums and newly added bassist Henning Ohlenbusch, is no stranger to the Pioneer Valley.

The quirky local band is finally getting some breaks and some notoriety with their headlining at the Iron Horse.

"We finally get our name on the tickets. This is a real privilege for us to play at such a place like this, since unsigned bands like ourselves rarely get a chance to headline such a well–known establishment as the Iron Horse," Pelis said.

Living off their local following, and their 1994 release Are You Still Dancin', Darlin, they are starting to receive label interests.

Humbert originally jumped on the scene in 1991 as Nag, Nag, Nag and included three of its current members — Vais, Westcott, and Pelis. The band played the U.P.C.–sponsored show in the Bluewall in 1992, opening for Superchunk. Later on that same year, they left the Valley in search of greener pastures in New York, and then later Richmond, Va. Things began to fall apart for Nag, Nag, Nag, when Pelis decided to return to his roots in New England. The rest of the band split to work on other projects, but later Vais and Westcott reunited and released their CD under the name of Humbert. They proceeded to return to the area and give Pelis a call. After going through a couple of bassists, the well–traveled group recently joined up with Ohlenbusch.

Ornette Coleman has his say on jazz

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

For this first of jazz/blues columns for the year, we'll be looking at Ornette Coleman's two collections of variations on 13 themes, called Sound Museum: Hidden Man and Sound Museum: Three Women, as well as looking at a tribute to the pioneering blues electric slide guitarist, Elmore James. A boiling blues album by musician/cook Bill Wharton and his band, The Ingredients, and an up–and– coming combo from the Florida panhandle will also be reviewed.

Much like Claude Monet's "series" paintings, which feature one landscape or structure (the Rouen Cathedral, the grass huts, the garden footbridge) in different lightings and seasons, Coleman uses the same theory of one idea in different texture and feel, spread between two versions, on the two Sound Museum collections.

The feeling derived from Hidden Man and Three Women is like someone presenting you with a yellow or a red– delicious apple, inviting you to taste of both of them, knowing that they are both apples, yet each has a taste and appearance of their own. On Three Women, the composition "City Living" is a galloping song, anchored by ride cymbal from Coleman's own son, Denardo. But on Hidden Man, the same theme is presented in a staccato, almost destructive sense.

"Women Of The Veil" on Hidden Man, features Ornette Coleman on trumpet playing subtly, but accompanied by chaos from Geri Allen on piano, Charnett Moffett on bass, and Denardo Coleman on drums. The same song and general idea is featured on Three Women, with Ornette Coleman still on trumpet, but now nicely accompanied on rhythm by his band. This collection of two CDs is evidence that Ornette Coleman still has a lot to say about where jazz goes.

Elmore James, who joined the mass migration of African– Americans in the post–WWII period to Chicago, helped found the "Chicago sound" of blues. James, who died in 1963, is considered the father of slide guitar.

He is hailed on a new disc, A Tribute To Elmore James, by the likes of Johnny Winter (opening the disc with a fine rendition of "Stranger Blues"), the Allman Brothers (the AOR–radio classic, "One Way Out"), and other blues artists. Unknowns like The Nighthawks and The Bluebirds get to shine with brilliant renditions of James' classics, alongside established names like Buddy Guy and Albert King.

The "Sauce Boss," as Wharton calls himself, due to his apparent cooking abilities, issues a collection of swampy blues, Standing In The Fire, with strong numbers like "Kino Song," the acoustic "Dancing In The Coals," a nice rendition of Chuck Berry's "Havana Moon," and the title track However, the first two tracks, "Sugarbone" and "I'm Cookin'" (the latter being true novelty shtick), don't do the rest of the album justice and may turn off listeners. Start the CD at track three, "Mighty Blue Sufi," make a souffle, and you'll have a great time.

Places to glimpse hawks flying south for winter

Alfresco News

Ahhhh... run for cover, the birds are coming! Clustered in thick black clouds, hawks are soaring through New England's chilly autumn skies to the warm tropical climates of the south. Hawks can be found in groups taking off for their southern flight at mountain ridges all over the Pioneer Valley. The peaks of the Mount Tom State Reservation Park, Holyoke Mountain Range, and the Skinner State Park are among the best hawk lookouts in New England.

Goat Peak, in Mount Tom State Reservation Park, is known for the numerous hawks that circle through its wooded slopes. Hawk flights at Mount Tom Reservation Park begin during late August and continue through November.

Goat Peak also provides a spectacular view of the Holyoke Range and the Skinner State Park. These parks include Mount Holyoke, Mount Nonotuck, Mount Sugarloaf and Mount Toby, and are known throughout New England as prominent hawk lookouts. Along the wooded slopes of these mountains, hawk migration takes place frequently throughout the entire fall and into the winter.

The Red–Tail and Broad Wing are New England's most common hawks. On cold sunny days, these massive birds can be seen extending their four–foot wings, riding up drafts caused by warm air rising up the mountain slopes from the valley below.

When Valley's warm air reaches the cold air that surrounds the mountain peaks, a thermal is formed. The hawks use wind currents created by thermals to ascend into high altitudes. Descending slowly through the sky, hawks glide from high altitudes to their southern destination.

However, one does not only have the opportunity to view hawks from the Pioneer Valley's mountain peaks, but the sweeping Connecticut Valley as well. This native valley includes Mount Greylock, the southern Green Mountains, Mount Manadnock, Wachusetts, Springfield, Hartford and Muriden. On clear days, the waters of the Long Island Sound appear to the south and north the famous Oxbow of the Connecticut River.

This weekend step into your hiking boots, hop into your car, and drive north on Highway 91 to Mount Tom State Reservation Park, Holyoke Range, or Skinner State Park and witness the hawks soaring through autumn's magnificent foliage in the colorful woodlands of the Pioneer Valley.

For more information about Mount Tom State Reservation Park. Holyoke Range or Skinner State Park call or write: (413)586–0350 or (413)253–2883

Designer hits the big time with Kennedy wedding

By Lauren Lobik
Collegian Correspondent

Millions of women's hearts are breaking all over the country because one man exchanged nuptials. John F. Kennedy Jr. married Carolyn Bessette on Sept. 21 on a small island off the coast of Georgia. This joyous occasion came as a surprise — not only to the country's female citizens, but also to America's most elite. Magazines and news shows have supplied us with many hours of facts and myths about what actually has transpired between the couple.

Another name has begun to pop up as being associated with the wedding. Narcisco Rodriguez is the man who designed Bessette's wedding gown. Rodriguez has become an overnight success, all due to the fact that his long–time friend, Bessette, asked him to create the gown she would wear when marrying the closest thing Americans have to royalty.

Rodriguez grew up in Kearny, N.J. According to People, he and the new Mrs. Kennedy became friends while they were employed at Calvin Klein in 1990. She worked in the public relations department, while he worked as a designer. They became such good friends through the years that he was one of the few she confided in about her upcoming marriage. Not only was her dress designed by him, but so was her rehearsal dinner frock and the garment worn by the maid–of–honor, Caroline Kennedy Schlossberg. Yet another gown he designed was worn by Clint Eastwood's new bride, Dina Ruiz, in March.

Everything about the dress and wedding were kept a secret by the designer. So no one would become suspicious, all fittings for the gown were made in Paris. The gown, to everyone's surprise, remained very simple, but elegant. The garment resembles many of the slip dresses Calvin Klein has made so popular. In Entertainment Weekly, Carolina Herrera, the women who designed the much–copied wedding gown worn by Caroline Kennedy, said, "She [Carolyn Bessette] looked smashing. Girls will of course want to look like her." Herrera isn't the only one who believes many more women will be adorning this new style. Rodriguez believes copies will be filling the racks of every mall in town.

Now that this wedding has made Rodriguez famous, what is he going to do now? Well, it's been rumored that he was offered his own label, but he turned it down. Guesses are that he wasn't ready for all the fame this wedding was going to bring him. Maybe in years to come, the world will be wearing the Rodriguez line of clothing.

The simple gown worn by Bessette, which cost around $40,000, has recently been compared to the other royalty we know of — Prince Charles and Princess Diana. The last time a wedding gown received so much media coverage came when the two got hitched. With her 25–foot train and abundance of taffeta, she was one of the most elegant looking brides. Recently in Entertainment Weekly, this style of 1981 has been compared to the more informal style of 1996. Maybe the silk crepe slip dress worn by Bessette resembles their marriage. Things will stay simple, expressing that the two married out of love, not prestige. Too many frills could have actually doomed Charles and Diana's union form the start.

The major winner to emerge from this holy matrimony was Rodriguez. Fame and fortune came to a virtually unknown designer from New Jersey. As mentioned earlier, men and women might be seen in years to come walking the streets in Rodriguez originals. All this because of a gown so simple, it looks as though it normally would be worn under a much more elaborate garment.

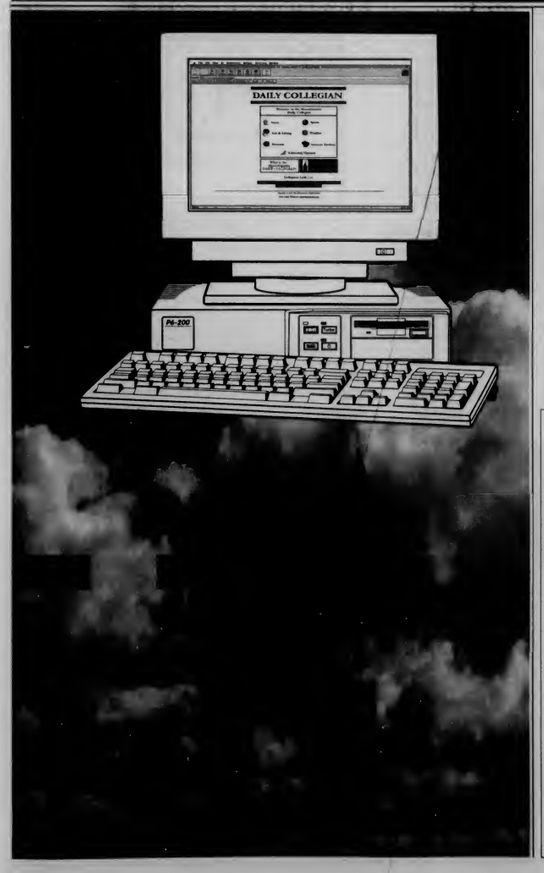
Despite the personnel change, the main difference between Nag, Nag, Nag and Humbert is that "we are much less punk and garage rock and more polished," Pelis said. He states that their only problem now is having to scrape up the cash to make a new album.

"We have a very large repertoire. The songs are all written, they just need to be recorded. On the average we only play about three or four songs from the CD during a 20 song set," Pelis said.



"Someone said to us that going to one of our shows was like channel–surfing," Pelis said. With such random influences as the Pixies, Nirvana, Tom Waits and the Replacements, it's no wonder that people have this feeling because each song is so different. There are songs like "Mallcop!," the minute–long hardcore song that rushes through you like a shot of adrenaline; the marriage proposal ballad, "Winnona Westcott;" and the hilarious jazzy lounge– singer style "Beautiful Lesbian," which gives you flashbacks of Bill Murray's old "Saturday Night Live" routine.

No matter what music you enjoy, Humbert covers it in one form or another. Pelis aptly stated, "What I like most about playing in Humbert is that we do not fit in the Top 40 or in any major category — we have our own sound."

Tree Fort rounds out Friday's bill. The garagey–country– punk band, which includes Ray Mason Band bassist Matt Hebert, has been described as a country version of the Violent Femmes.

Humbert performs at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton tomorrow night at 10 p.m. with Tree Fort. Tickets are $5 and are available at the door. Call the club at 584–0610 for more information.

ing high school. Many people have had a taste of a long term relationship, and, even though they're still nervous every time they step onto the field, they know what the basics of the game are: confidence, coolness and concentration.

Hence, they're sent up to the majors — the college years. Some folks have the skills, but aren't quite ready for the Big Game when they're called up. Most of us fall into this first category.

Some were born ready for greatness, and make a smooth transition. These are the people who we hate, yet have to admire.

Some will never be ready. These are the people who sign 15-day contracts (i.e. brief flings, quickly soured relationships, etc.) before returning to the minors.

So you've made it to the top rung of the ladder — now you have to play ball. You're about to face your first pitcher (i.e. first romantic prospect in college), and the butterflies are doing the Argentine tango in your gut.

Most of us are entirely too excited, and wind up swinging at the first pitch, usually a bad one. It is precisely then that the pitcher knows that he/she will dominate you. Thus, the hurler loses interest in the challenge, striking you out with a series of curveballs and (heart) breaking balls, saving the heat for a real batter.

You sit back down in the clubhouse, your back pelted by the sympathetic handslaps of your teammates. They've all been there before.

Sooner or later, however, you will make contact with the ball. In dating, just as in baseball, this does not necessarily mean you'll get anywhere. Your bat may connect with a pitch designed to jam you into a ground-out, or may send that sucker way back, only to be snagged at the warning track for a fly-out.

Although these false alarms frustrate the living hell out of us, we must remember that this is dating baseball, and we all have the Babe Ruth factor on our side. No, this doesn't mean the obvious — only a legend could point to a given stadium section and ensure a dinger would soon travel in that direction. What it means is that we are all both hitters and pitchers in this game.

Your subsequent counterattack can be sweet and fruitful, especially if a pitcher's duel (i.e. flirtatious conversation) ensues. You strike him/her out all day, he/she sends you down fanning time after time. The (sexual) tension builds as both parties vie for victory. This can go on for games and games at a time.

Sometimes you end up playing for the same team (i.e. a relationship), while other times it's time for a trade (i.e. someone else looks appealing). All's fair in love, war and baseball.

In the end, you build respect for your opponents in this most infuriating, yet rewarding, of contests. Much like baseball itself, dating is a tortuous and laborious process — the final result is what counts.

Personally, I'd rather hit one homer a year in the majors than 50 cheap ones in the minors.

C. Taylor Conner is a Collegian columnist are married in cyberspace.

But the spirit of dating cannot be totally dead — just take a look at the pages of the Advocate's personals and you will see a lot of lonely single people out there, paying money to find a date. Why the complexities?

• Pull a Jan Brady and find a made-up date. Honestly, this is a popular college scheme, especially for freshmen who brag about their "boyfriend"/"girlfriend" back home, who suspiciously never calls or visits.

Do these options sound hopeless to you too? Or am I the only lost romantic who misses the good ole days before I was even born? Are we too cool for dates? Maybe we are not patient enough to follow through with the rituals of dating?

Dating may not be perfect; most things that cause near heart attacks aren't, but we must save the practice before it is dead.

Without dates, think of all the funny stories future generations would miss out on... the time in sixth grade when I attempted 274 times to call up a girl and ask her to hang out... the time I asked a girl out and then nearly broke my back tripping over her shoes... my phone breaking after slamming down the receiver 274 times.

Dating is already an endangered pastime — we must preserve it before it completely dies out and disappears.

Mike Burke is a Collegian columnist.

that the date is successful — is that equally awkward and terrifying question: "Would you go out with me?"

"It's terrible," Carter said of popping the question.

Asking someone out is hard enough — waiting for the answer is another story.

"I asked Jean out," Carter said. "She waited two minutes, and I started to get into that panic mode and pull back, you know that's fine, I just wanted to tell you how I feel."

Much to Carter's relief, Foster agreed and the couple has been together almost for two years now and has been engaged since last October.

Of course, once a relationship has begun, the challenge of staying together begins.

Adams advises liking the person you're involved with.

"If you don't like them, don't stay with them," she said.

Staying involved with what's going on with the other person is also very important.

"If you're not paying attention, don't bother," Powers said.

Both Foster and Carter advise being patient as a key ingredient in a strong and healthy relationship.

And the best part of being in a long-term relationship is that dating is a thing of the past.

"Dating is terrible," Carter said. "You're scouting out the other person, as terrible as that sounds. I'm glad I don't have to do it anymore."

of the imagination is this to be considered a romantic movie, but when it's over you can't help but feel safe and warm after staring into Michael Rooker's wonky eyes for 90 minutes.

TOP GUN
Directed by Tony Scott
with Tom Cruise, Kelly McGillis, Tom Skerritt

Top Gun will probably always be remembered as the movie that took Tom Cruise and made him into TOM CRUISE. But lurking in the background of this naval aviation flyboy flick, besides "Take my Breath Away" over and over and over again..., are Val Kilmer, Anthony Edwards, Meg Ryan and Tim Robbins. If you grew up in the '80s, then you're probably sick to death of this, but try renting Sleep with Me to see Quentin Tarantino's most ingenious monologue on reading Top Gun with the homosexual undertones.

UNTAMED HEART
Directed by Tony Bill
with Christian Slater, Marisa Tomei, Rosie Perez

Somewhere between a Love Story for our generation and a Sunday night movie of the week is this 1993 drama about an unlucky-in-love waitress (Tomei) and her roommate with a busboy (Slater), who's under the delusion that he's had a baboon heart transplanted into his chest. Rosie Perez is the best friend and fellow waitress with the same amount of rabid hysteria brought to everything she does. This is a romantic movie that might not enchant all, especially if you're not into public displays of affection, since odds are that someone will be weeping by the end.

SLEEPLESS IN SEATTLE
Directed by Nora Ephron
with Tom Hanks, Meg Ryan, Rosie O'Donnell

This recent box-office hit features Hanks as a widower with a young son, and Ryan as the woman who hears him on a radio show and thinks she's fallen in love with him. Ephron certainly knows her romantic comedy territory, being one of the scribes of When Harry met Sally..., and it's truly unique to have a movie where the leads never really get a chance to meet. Both O'Donnell and Rob Reiner provide good fodder in the obligatory wacky best-friend roles.

love no matter what sex it comes from. There's no particular place you'll find it, but you'll know when you do. Just make sure that it doesn't leave you on the hood of someone's car, even if it's Ani herself.

Jesse's Story:

Okay, picture this: You're walking along on a beautiful, sunny day, and out of the corner of your eye you see a cute guy following you closely. You turn around, and he introduces himself. You ponder your good fortune in meeting this guy, as he inquires about your major, your interests, etc. And then he asks you if you've found God, and nags you for the next half-hour.

No, this isn't a scene from a bus terminal — this is my tragic life.

Please, please, no pity party.

My point is, it seems impossibly hard to find a date if you're a gay man on this campus. It's not that I don't know enough gay men — I'm friends with a lot of them. It just seems that in a college of this size, with this many people, you'd think there would be more visibility among gay people.

Add to that the fear of getting your face punched in by some straight boy (how was I supposed to know?) who doesn't like being looked at, and it all adds up to too many dinners-for-one at the dining commons.

Suppose, though, I were to find someone who was interested. Noting my past luck, he would either be psychotic (you know who you are) or completely self- obsessed. Why, then, do all of my straight girlfriends insist that all the good men are gay? It seems to me that the grass is often greener on the other side.

On the other hand, not being attached means I can flirt whenever I wish. Hey, think of how much more time I can devote to my academics. That all sounds very sad.

It's all well though. I guess I'll just keep reminding myself of what Snow White sang: "Some day my prince will come."

Jamie's story:

I have lots of stories. There have been lots of people, and I've been through it all more or less. Just recently I came right back to where I started from. This story in particular originates at the end of last semester.

On numerous occasions, I had seen this girl with beautiful curly brown hair and a gorgeous smile who was avoiding eye contact with me. I knew bits and pieces of information about her (from asking around and stuff), but I wasn't really sure who she was. Completely "not my type" as friends would say, she was too nice and we were, in short, too different.

We spoke a few times on the phone, but never really got together in person. The last time we spoke was the last day of school, right before we were leaving to go home for the summer. That was that. Until now...

Two days into this current semester I was walking around campus with a friend and she walked by. We looked at each other in a strange, muffled way, and proceeded to talk for about 10 seconds. I got her new phone number and decided to give her a call. Playing hard to get I suppose, it took her about three days to call me back.

The night after we spoke, I asked her to go out for a walk. We walked around campus until four in the morning just talking. The next night, I met her at a party and we talked in the background for a few hours. When the party was over, we stayed up to watch the sunrise.

Basically, that's the story — we have been together ever since and its great. I guess it's happened at the right time because it would have never worked out last semester. I definitely was not looking for anything along the lines of what our relationship has evolved into — I have come to realize that's usually when love happens.

ing at 4-0 with a No. 6 ranking.

Florida State is also undefeated, and it goes into the Orange Bowl ranked No. 3, behind Ohio State and Florida. But the Seminoles haven't killed teams like they used to. North Carolina held the vaunted FSU scoring machine to only 13 points, in Tallahassee, and it had all kinds of trouble with a Duke team that couldn't beat Florida A&M, let alone Florida State. If the Hurricanes pull off the upset, consider them contenders.

• Booty Schwag of the Week Award

It gives me great pleasure to present this week's award to... Temple. Not only were the Owls schwag this weekend, they were schwiggity-schwiggity schwiz-ag. They lost to Pitt! At home! 53-52! Besides the fact that hoop season is coming soon, and it's always good to practice your Temple bashing, (Marc Jackson's a thug!) anyone who loses to Pitt should have to turn in their Div. I membership card and join the Patriot League, with the likes of Fordam and Holy Cross.

After the game, coach Ernest Dickerson announced that the win was all his fault, and turned in his resignation. Only pleading from the highest reaches of the Temple athletic department brought Dickerson back, which goes to show just how bright everyone down in Owl-ville actually is.

If these two teams want a rematch, I'll set it up. We could call it the Poulan-Weed Eater Booty Schwag Bowl. We can play it in the Meadowlands, and if the Jets and Giants are free, we can have a tournament. Screw the real bowl alliance, this is better!

• Tonight's Game

Southern Miss. at East Carolina.

Once again, "Seinfeld," "Friends" and "E.R." have new episodes, but you did that a few weeks ago. Tonight, I want you to go out and enjoy yourself. Have a few cocktails, hang with your buddies, maybe take that special girl out for a soda and a movie. If you absolutely need to watch this game, remember this: the favorite has covered in every Thursday night game so far this year. Of course, betting is illegal, and I would never endorse such a thing. (Shhh... Take E. Carolina and the points, E. Carolina and the points!)

would have fared much better if they had been made aware of their start.

In what should be a more challenging race, UMass heads south to the Head Of The Connecticut this weekend, in Middletown, Conn. "This will be the race we use to flex our muscles and tune up for the Head Of The Charles," Captain Amy Kenny said. With the field including powerhouses like Brown and other top teams, UMass will be looking to measure its talent.

The Minutewomen will be entering heavy eights, lightweight fours, and the open weight fours once again. They will also race a JV team there as well.

All attention will then turn to the highlight of the rowing year, the Head Of The Charles Regatta on the Charles River, in Boston. The race is internationally known and will feature some of the top rowing teams in the world. Still, captain Kenny is expecting a top three finish from her lightweight boat.

The field will include the National Crew Team and Riverside Racing Club, both of whom are extremely strong rowering teams. With a race of this magnatude approaching, it will be hard for the minutewomen to focus on the upcoming race. But coach Dietz should have his team ready for both races and look for UMass to make some noise in the next two weekends.

Rutgers, and Minnesota.

James Felton, a 6-foot-9 forward from Marist, N.J., and Brian Berstiecker, a 6-foot-10 forward out of Virginia Beach, also have UMass among their contenders. Seton Hall and Kentucky probably have the inside track on Felton, while Berstiecker rates North Carolina and Georgia Tech as his top two.

• In other conference scouting and signing action, VaTech is being considered by Richmond, Vir. forward Brian Williams and Greensboro, N.C. center Aron McMillan. Oak Hill Academy product Dee Tolliver, a 6-foot-5 shooting guard, is also looking at the Hokies.

Reggie Jesse, a 6-foot-6 forward, is either Big East or A- 10 bound, as is 6-foot-4 forward Dalonte Hill (out of Oak Hill).

• Thirty players in the top 100 have already given verbal commitments to schools for next year.

Schea Cotton, a 6-foot-5 forward out of St. John Bosco who has been one of the most highly sought after bluechippers since he began high school, has taken the pressure off himself and given his word to Long Beach State.

Ricky Davis, rated No. 6 in the nation, has committed to Iowa as has No. 17 Dean Oliver; No. 11 Baron Davis has given a verbal to UCLA; No. 14 Edwin "Greedy" Daniels said he will play for UNLV.

Boston College has received the word from Mike Bradley, Elton Tyler and Joe DePina; Uconn snagged Edmund Saunders; Kentucky has verbal commitments from Myron Anthony and Ryan Hogan; Erle Chenowith has committed to Kansas; and UNC has gotten a verbal from Max Owens.

Purdue has latched on to Cameron Stephens and Jamaal Davis; Jermaine Medley will play at Villanova; Luke Recker said he wants to work under Bob Knight at Indiana; Terrance Morris verbally committed to Maryland; Larry Hughes will stay in his home town and play at St. Louis; Erron Maxey surprised everyone by committed to Providence; Texas roped in Lamar Wright; Michigan got a commitment from Brandon Smith; and Michigan State will add Doug Davis to its roster.

• UCLA recruit Davis is now embroiled in a possible violation of NCAA rules because two days after he gave the Bruins his verbal commitment, UCLA coach John Harrick's son sold a car to Davis' sister.

This could be an infraction because NCAA rules state that financial aid or other benefits to a recruit, his family or friends by any "institution's staff or any representatives of its athletic interests."

The car, a black 1991 Chevy Blazer which Harrick bought in December of 1991 was registered to the Bruins' coach and sold by his son Glenn to Lisa Hodoh on Sept. 20 for $5000 the Los Angeles Times reported. The Times also reported that Davis was seen sortly thereafter driving the car at school.

• The UCLA situation could affect the decisions of tin bluechippers Jason and Jarron Collins. The pair have said they will sign at the same school and have narrowed their choices to UCLA, Stanford, Arizona and Duke. The Arizona Daily Star reported that because of Davis, Stanford now leads in the race with Arizona close behind. The twins' father said that the decision is still open.

• While former UMass assistant Bill Bayno has secured a top recruit in Daniels (whom they nabbed because Runnin' Rebels assistant Glynn Cyprien had known Daniels throughout his childhood), he is in a little bit of trouble with his incoming class.

Isaiah Epps, a 6-foot-10 freshman out of Main Central Institue, is not yet eligible and is schedule to take a test later this month to try to qualify and Mark Dickel has been ruled ineligible by the NCAA Clearinghouse. All this in addition to losing senior Eddie Corbett to academic trouble.

Roberto Alomar recieves a true Bronx cheer in New York

By Douglas J. Rowe
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Yankees fans expressed their opinion about Roberto Alomar's spit by showing a little polish.

They simply booed.

They booed and heckled him during batting practice. They booed heartily during the pregame introductions — and even louder during his first at-bat.

And those boos turned to thunderous cheers when he struck out looking in the first inning.

He gently laid down his helmet and bat, then teammate Bobby Bonilla brought his glove out to him as he took the field for the bottom of the first.

In the second inning, the crowd cheered derisively when Paul O'Neill's grounder kicked off the heel of Alomar's glove for an error. However, on the very next play, Alomar made a fine backhand flip to second on Mariano Duncan's grounder.

But despite concerns about violence — in the form of hurled batteries, or other projectiles — nothing flew through the air except a few expletives and unprintable chants.

Outside the stadium's bleacher entrance, a sign clearly warns: "Bottles, Cans, Coolers, Hard Containers are Prohibited In Stadium."

Just below that clear caveat, Mary Ippoliti of Schenectady, N.Y., held her own sign: "No Spit Zone."

"I have a grandson and I wouldn't want him doing it," said the woman, who described herself as a Yankees fan "through and through."

As for any violent actions against the Baltimore Orioles second baseman, she said: "I hope not."

But when Greg Packer of suburban Long Island happened by, he overheard her and offered: "This is the Bronx, this is New York, and people are going to do what they want to do here. I agree with her sign. But (security) people can only do so much."

Alomar came out of the third-base dugout with about 10 camera crews — and many more burly, suited security guards — gathered around. He took batting practice with the first group of Orioles. As he was talking to a teammate, one person yelled, "Hey, Alomar, you're a pig."

Still, Alomar look relaxed, if not unfazed.

He was met with a smattering of boos then. In the pregame introductions, those boos were resounding.

Security was beefed up for the game — city police and private security — and Alomar entered the stadium through a different gate from the one used by the other players.

Women's Rugby crushed by Radcliffe

The UMass women's rugby team suffered a major setback Saturday as it was downed by Radcliffe 23-5 on the Boyden fields last weekend.

The loss marks the second time this season UMass has fallen to Radcliffe, with the first lost coming in a 15-0 beating in the Beantown Tournament.

UMass came out fired up, driving Radcliffe down the field, but a few mental errors and breakdowns led to a barrage of Radcliffe scoring that could not be overcome.

UMass' lone try came in the second half. Senior co- captain Claudia Morales took a neat ball from the scrum and ran to find an open wing, sophomore Bess Woluen for the try.

"It was a tough loss because we know we can compete with Radcliffe," Morales said. UMass could indeed have one more chance to beat Radcliffe in the playoffs. To do that, they would need to win their next two league games against Brown and Bowdoin.

UMass' B-Side also fell to Radcliffe 12-7 on the weekend. Size was yet again a factor as a bigger, stronger Radcliffe team was able to drive UMass easily throughout the match. Standouts for the B-Side included junior Sherri Fiore, sophomore Sandra Warton, and freshmen Lauren Sauro and Natalie Morales.

UMass is off this weekend, then plays at Brown, before returning to UMass to face Bowdoin on Oct. 26.

"I want to ride my bicycle..."

• Last Sunday, the UMass Bicycle Racing Club hosted the second annual UMass Collegiate Mountain Bike Race, and for the second year in a row, won the race. The schools that participated last weekend were MIT, Plymouth College, RPI, UNH, Vassar College, and Vermont Law School. The home squad beat out second place UNH and third place Plymouth State, and were helped by the newer members of the team.

First-timers Mike Chopchitz won the men's B race, and Heather Shea won the women's B race. Other first-timers who placed well were Tara Mate, Larry Lague and Ryan Gallager. Chris McDonald, who is a member of the U.S. National Road team, was the highest points scorer for UMass as he placed third in the men's A race.

The UMass team travels next to UNH on Sunday, Oct. 13th, and will be looking to better its second place finish there last year. Anyone wishing to race should attend the meeting tonight at 7:30 in Campus Center room 805, or contact Dan Coady at 256-8175.

"Sailing, takes me where I want go..."

•The UMass Sailing Club did not place where they wanted to place, as they finished ninth in both the inaugural Northern Series Regatta at Tufts University last Sept. 21, and in the second annual Northern Series at Dartmouth College last Sept. 28.

The club's next regatta will be at the University of Vermont on Oct. 13, with following regattas including the Smith Trophy Regatta at UNH on Oct. 26, and the invite at Trinity College on Nov. 2. Anyone interested in sailing either as a racer or for recreation can contact Darryl at 546- 0470, or stop by the office in Student Union room 423C.

Intramural action

• In UMass intramural competition, Brian Blumenfeld defeated Ted Ekholm in the men's tennis singles tournament; while in the woman's tourney, Danielle Serronico defeated Huong Hoynh. In field hockey, the Balls conquered the Pioneers 6-0.

• There is still time to enter teams for volleyball for the men's, women's and co-rec divisions. Individuals may attend the single meeting Oct. 16 or Oct. 17 at 5:30 p.m. in Boyden 249. Get your basketballs ready, foul shooting, 3- point shoot out, and three on three hoops will be happening soon, stop by the intramural office for details.

UCLA hoops under fire

LOS ANGELES (AP) — UCLA's basketball program is being investigated following a published report that a car owned by coach Jim Harrick was sold to a woman two days after her brother verbally committed to play for the Bruins.

UCLA athletic director Peter Dalis told the Los Angeles Times that although the car was registered to Harrick, it was Harrick's son Glenn who sold the car to Lisa Hodoh on Sept. 20.

The transaction is a possible NCAA violation. NCAA rules prohibit financial aid or other benefits to the recruit or the recruits' relatives or friends by any "institution's staff member or any representative of its athletics interests."

"The UCLA Athletic Department and the Pacific-10 Conference are jointly investigating the Bruin men's basketball program after allegations were brought to our attention by the Los Angeles Times," Dalis said in a statement issued Tuesday.

"Until the conclusion of the investigation process, there will be no further comment(s) from the University."

Baron Davis, Hodoh's younger brother, is a 6-foot-1 point guard who recently began his senior year at Santa Monica Crossroads High School. He was considered one of the top 30 prep players in the country, but after a strong performance at the Nike Camp in July, he was rated the top prep point guard in the nation and a top-10 prospect.

In addition to UCLA, Davis was considering Duke and Kansas, but canceled visits to both schools when he committed to the Bruins.

Department of Motor Vehicles records show Harrick bought the car, a black 1991 Chevy Blazer, in December 1990, and it had 112,960 miles the day Hodoh bought it.

Dalis and Hodoh said the vehicle was sold for $5,000, but the Kelley Blue Book lists the retail value of that model of the car, factoring out mileage, at $12,750.

According to DMV procedures, the registered owner must sign over title.

Glenn Harrick, at 27 the youngest of Harrick's three sons, is employed by the Fox Sports organization in Los Angeles. He didn't return a phone call Tuesday.

UCLA was eliminated in the first round of the NCAA tournament by Princeton last March.

The previous spring, the Bruins won their first NCAA championship in 20 years.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21-April 20
Don't let an adrenaline rush push you over the edge. You need to use common sense and past wisdom to make a truly good decision. Work off some steam with a vigorous exercise routine and cap off your week with some kind of outdoor activity.

TAURUS
April 21-May 21
A noisy environment grates on your nerves. Ask a friend to provide perspective on a difficult situation. Things should turn around soon. Avoid the company of a rowdy group—they'll lead you astray at a time when you need to be productive.

GEMINI
May 22-June 21
The atmosphere is charged with possibilities early in the week. Count on a trusted adviser to help you tell the difference between the castles in the air and the genuine opportunities. Then, don't hesitate—just reach for the sky, and you'll achieve your goals.

CANCER
June 22-July 22
Hectic pacing and high stress levels get you down toward the middle of the week. Treat yourself to some time in a quiet place to recharge your batteries. A family situation demands most of your time and attention as the week draws to a close.

LEO
July 23-August 23
Follow a friend to a place you've never been before. Adventure is a spice that makes your whole life taste good. Best of all, you don't need to take huge risks to achieve a monumental payoff this week. That goes for all kinds of investments.

VIRGO
August 24-September 22
Plan ahead for the future, whether that means establishing a retirement plan, setting a career goal or just strengthening some family ties. Your wit and charm are strong this week, so put yourself to work winning over a person who's regarded as difficult.

LIBRA
September 23-October 23
The temptation to overspend is strong this week. Clip some coupons, or better yet, avoid the mall altogether. Instead, spend some time outside; or if the weather won't permit that, then start a new project. Your personal life is a source of inner strength.

SCORPIO
October 24-November 22
Feeling overwhelmed by work? See how much you can delegate. But don't kid yourself—avoid seeking help from those whom you can't trust to get the job done right. Catch up on sleep this weekend and then call an old friend for advice.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23-December 21
The fall blahs set in with a vengeance this week. Treat yourself to a little extra TLC and do something fun. It doesn't have to be expensive to be worthwhile. Dazzle a romantic partner with your creativity, and you'll be able to take things to the next level.

CAPRICORN
December 22-January 20
You're full of energy and enthusiasm—it's a great time to tackle a really big project. Why not remodel or organize your closets? You'll feel even better when you've accomplished something worthwhile. An old friend could be in need of your support.

AQUARIUS
January 21-February 18
You won't miss a thing this week—even the things that remain unsaid. Don't waste your chance to learn more about a mysterious person. Everything will make more sense toward the end of the week, when the whole picture starts to take shape.

PISCES
February 19-March 20
Turn your energies toward the home front this week. Someone close to you could be starving for attention, or maybe you just need to be kind to yourself. Add some zest to your weekend with a social event. Just put on your party duds and have fun!

Midnight Madness to strike Mullins

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team will officially kick off the 1996–97 season during Midnight Madness on Monday night at the William D. Mullins Center.

Midnight Madness has become a celebrated annual event, as many teams across the country hold practice session that are open to the public. The season opens at midnight on Oct. 15 because it is against NCAA rules to practice as a team before that date.

Tickets are available at Curry Hicks Cage from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. If there are tickets left over, a limited number may be available at the door. Anybody attending Midnight Madness will need a ticket, however, to participate in any drawings. Students and fans will be allowed to enter the Mullins Center at 10:30 p.m. and a free movie–style "BruiserBall" poster will be given away to everybody at the door.

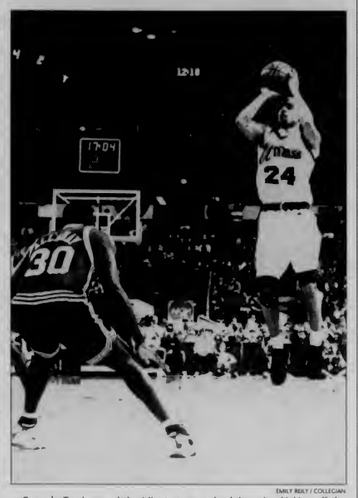
This year the UMass Athletic Department is going all out for the event, offering prizes, give–aways and contests in addition to the player introductions and scheduled intrasquad scrimmage.

ESPN's Mike Tirico will be the guest emcee, but the event will not be broadcast on that network. Local ABC affiliate WGBY Channel 40 will have live cut–ins, but will also not be broadcasting Midnight Madness live.

The scrimmage has been reduced to a 10–minute game rather than a longer edition that has been used in the past. More time instead will be devoted to player introductions and contests.

There will be a slam dunk contest and a three–point contest styled after similar NBA events. Carmelo Travieso, Edgar Padilla, Charlton Clarke and possibly two others will take place in the three–point contest; while the entrants for the slam dunk competition have not been finalized. There will be celebrity judges for the dunks, but those names have not been released.

UMass basketbal staff assistant Brian Gorman said that the player introductions this year will be "spiced up from past years." Lasers, smoke and other devices will be used to make the presentation of players "more glitzy."



The introduction of first–year head coach James "Bruiser" Flint will also be a completely revamped presentation, but Gorman would not give any hints as to what to expect.

"It's all new, a new theme song and everything, but it'll stay a secret until the unveiling," Gorman said.

Gorman said that there will be several drawings and give– aways to entice fans. Ticket numbers will be drawn at random for various trips. An airline ticket for one to Florida during spring break and a trip for one with the Minutemen to Chicago for the Great Eight Tournament, to be held Dec. 5 and 4, will be given away through random drawings.

A trip for two with the Minutemen to the Maui Invitational in Hawaii during Thanksgiving will be given away as well. A ticket number will be called at random and that person will be given one chance to make basket from half–court, if the shot is made that person will win a trip to the Maui Invitational.

Gorman emphasized that the drawings will be based on the tickets taken at the door and that people will not be eligible for the drawings if they do not have a ticket.

EMILY REILY / COLLEGIAN

Carmelo Travieso and the Minutemen are back in action kicking off the season with Midnight Madness on Monday.

And then there were five; UF, OSU top contenders

With last week's Ohio State romp, we can safely assume that the Buckeyes have already packed their bags for Pasadena. Big Ten pretenders such as Penn St. and Michigan have fallen by the wayside, allowing the college football world to clear it's collective throats and declare, "Only five left!"

That's right, kids, only five teams remain in the hunt for the Sug–ahh Bowl, the site of this year's national championship game. They are, in order of probability: Florida, Ohio State, Florida State, Nebraska and Alabama. (For the last time, Arizona St. does not count.) You'll notice that I didn't include such unbeatens as Miami, LSU, West Virginia, California and Wyoming. Of this bunch, only Miami has even a slight chance at a national title, but don't hold your breath.

As for the others, yeah, whatever.

LSU is a decent football team, and impressed me by beating Auburn on the road a few weeks back. Coach Gerry DiNardo has done an admirable job rebuilding a wounded Tiger program, but it has to get through such SEC luminaries as Florida and Tennessee if it wants the ring. Ain't gonna happen. Much like any other big time conference, the talent is much greater at the top. When cute little stories such as Louisiana St. try to sneak through, they're usually squashed by kids who can run 4.3 40's and can't even count on one finger their All–Conference selections. But that's usually because they can't count at all.

Wyoming won't win because they're from the WAC, which is, for all intents and purposes, whak. They're 6–0 in a conference that now includes San Jose St. and Fresno St, and the minimal pull that the WAC once had in the polls is gone.

LUKE MEREDITH College Football

West Virginia does this every five years or so, running off a great season before getting spanked by a real team. Don't worry about the Mountaineers, they'll do it again. As for California, a school known more for bongs and peace movements than it is for football, good work last Saturday. It beat USC in the Coliseum, but I'm afraid that's not enough. Remember, Southern Cal returned only one offensive starter from last year's Rose Bowl champs, and it ain't Keyshawn Johnson. He plays for the Jets, who are much worse than the Trojans.

Miami has a chance to make me eat my words this weekend. In the biggest game in the Butch Davis era, the Hurricanes entertain ACC heavyweight Florida St. Saturday. This has all the makings of a very interesting tropical tussle. Miami, while not looking as impressive as it used to, has put up a good showing for Butch, stand-

In UMass net, Jeff Jablonski shows solid work ethic

By Chris Krein
Collegian Correspondent

Jeff Jablonski's work ethic is equal parts intensity and ferocity. It is an ethic that has brought him to the forefront of the Massachusetts men's soccer team. It is also an approach that is not lost on his coach, Sam Koch.

"His training habits are some of the best on the team," Koch relates. "He works his tail off every day in practice."

However, the person behind that ethic is a quiet, thoughtful person, who is quick to give credit to those who have helped him emerge as one of the rising stars of the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

Jablonski is a local product, having attended Ludlow High School, where he played basketball and track and field. He was an All–Western Massachusetts first team selection in track and field for 1994, and the Western Mass. shot put champion the same year. Soccer, at the time, was merely an after thought.

He was not recruited coming out of high school, so the appeal of staying close to home brought him to UMass. He is enrolled as a History major, with a focus on European history. He is also involved with R.O.T.C.

The fierce work ethic burned inside him and he decide to try out for the men's soccer team. It is his parents that he credits for instilling in him the work ethic that has allowed him to push himself to make the soccer team.

"I've always received encouragement and support from my family," he said. "I never let up and I tried every day as hard as I could."

In his first year at UMass, 1994, he redshirted and did not play. However, upperclassman keeper, Eric Gruber took the time to impart wisdom to the freshman. It was an act that was taken with gracious appreciation.

"Eric helped me out a great deal," said Jablonski. "He spent a lot of time with me to help me hone my skills."

Jeff Jablonski

1995 was Jabonski's first year of NCAA eligibility and he was able to see some action, logging in 108 minutes in three games, behind Gruber. His reaction to last season, though, is one of mixed feelings.

"I was a little nervous," he states. "I was not as confident going into games as I should have been."

Those feelings that limited his time last year however, were quickly displaced after the 1996 campaign commenced.

Jablonski played excellent minutes against a highly rated Duke team, shutting them out while he was in the game. He harkens back to those minutes as the key to quickly gaining the self–assurance that has marked his solid play this year.

Jablonski's opportunity came when Tim Pearson went down earlier this season with a shoulder injury. Actually, Jablonski did not just fill in for Pearson, he exploded into the spotlight, tallying two shutouts in his first two starts. Even more impressive is that those shutouts came on the road against Temple and St. Joseph's.

"I had absolutely no hesitations about putting him in," Koch said. "You've got to give assistant coach, Jon Voight, a lot of credit. He has done an excellent job in getting our goalkeepers prepared."

Voight is garnering kudos from Jablonski as well.

"The attitiude that he [Voight] brings makes practice very hard, but it is also a lot of fun," said Jablonski, with enthusiasm. "I really look forward to practice."

Temple is the benchmark that Jablonski points to as the moment when he realized how far the team had come.

"We started coming together, not just as a team, but as a family," Jablonski said. "We are helping each other out."

Jablonski makes it clear that his own success is merely a product of a total team effort. The backs, especially, are constant in their support.

"They help me out a lot," said Jablonski. "But it's everyone on the team. The guys cheering on the bench, the forwards, and the coaches."

After a difficult overtime defeat to Virginia Tech, 3–1, he rebounded with another stellar game last Sunday, shutting down George Washington, 2–1.

Jablonski brings his fiery approach to Richard F. Garber field on Friday against Dayton at 3:30 pm. The squad then faces Xavier on Sunday at 1:00 pm to finish off the homestand. His record entering this weekend stand at 3–1–0. He boasts 20 saves and an impressive 0.94 GAA. Statistics are not what Jeff Jablonski is about though. It is the drive to constantly improve his play.

"This will be a big home weekend for us after being on the road for so long," exclaims Jablonski. "I'm really looking forward to these games."

Crew takes Textile, women's rugby falls

Lightweight Eight takes first

• The Massachusetts men's crew travelled to Lowell last weekend to compete in the Head of the Textile River Regatta. The head race, which is a long staggered start race was three miles long. In the lightweight competiton, the UMass eight took first place out of seven crews, narrowly defeating Rutgers by four seconds with a time of 17:43. In open eight competition, UMass took seventh out of 21 boats in a tight field, missing fourth place by 31 seconds. The club eight boat (1.V. eight) took home the fifth spot in the 14 baot feild. The crew travels to Middletown, Conn. to compete in the Head of the Connecticut.

Equestrian team kicks off season

• The University of Massachusetts equestrian team began its fall season last Saturday, as they competed in a show held at Fox Meadow Farm in Northampton. The show was hosted by Smith College, and UMass placed third out of thirteen schools with a total of 35 points. Mt. Holyoke was the high point college of the day with 43 points, and Smith was the hostess with the mostest, taking the reserve high point college total with 37 points.

The UMass team had strong rides, and had two riders place first in their divisions: Angela Pappas and Heather Clark placed first in the Intermediate Horsemanship Over Fences and the Open Horsemanship Divisions, respectively; while Alison Bozarth in the Novice Horsemanship Division placed second, and Carrie Edgington in the Open Horsemanship Over Fences Division placed third.

SPORTS BRIEFS

Also placing well were Stacey MacDonald in the Walk– Trot Division (2nd), and Amber Kawecki in the Walk–Trot– Canter Division (4th).

The team is under new leadership this year, as Jerry Schurink, who is the director of the riding program, has taken over the coaching duties from Wendy Ciccui. The next show will be held on Saturday, Oct. 12, and will be

Women's crew has strong showings in first weekend

By Matt Perrault
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew is in the middle of two races that should prepare them for the upcoming Head of The Charles regatta.

The first of the two races was held last weekend in Lowell. This regatta, on the Merrimack River, didn't attract the class of the sport since it was outside of Boston, but it did get the likes of the University of New Hampshire, the University of Vermont, and Boston College. None of the Atlantic 10 teams bothered to show up for the race but the field consisted of twenty five schools.

UMass made a strong showing by placing first in the lightweight eight, second in the lightweight four, and fourth in the open weight four as well.

In the lightweight four victory, the Minutewomen only faced one other foe. Vermont put up a fight in the beginning of the race, but coach Jim Dietz yelled to his team to pick up the pace. His team responded by passing UVM and sprinting towards the finish. The team finished with a great time, in fact, they were so fast that they have finished seventh in the heavy weight division.

Though Varsity had success, the junior varsity had some bad luck. The official who was supposed to start their race didn't show up and the boat didn't know when they were on the course. They still managed to finish twelfth but

Verbal committments given as hoop season nears

While college basketball fans nationwide have begun to salivate in anticipation of the annual opening of the collegiate hoop season (Oct. 15), they have also fixed a steely gaze on the wide world of recruiting.

The early signing period for this year's high school seniors is less than a month away and several schools are beginning to reap recruiting rewards.

Here's a look at who's looking where, and who's already given verbal committments.

• On the homefront Massachusetts seems to have a stranglehold on Atlantic 10 recruiting. The Minutemen are on the lists of six of the top 100 seniors, while the closest other A–10 school, Virginia Tech, is on the list of three recruits.

Allen Griffin, a 6–foot–1 guard out of Brooklyn, is the highest rated player UMass is looking at. He started the year at Durango High In Las Vegas, but recently moved back home to New York. He was looking seriously at UNLV, but is now considering schools in the east after his recent move. Connecticut and other Big East schools are also on his list.

UMass and Cincinnati are the two schools trying to pry Ron Kelly away from local schools. Kelly, a 6–foot–10 center out of Emory, Texas averaged 21 points per game and 14 rebounds per game last year.

Marvin O'Connor is the top prospect in Philadelphia, where UMass has had success recruiting. The 6–foot–3 senior at Simon Gratz effectively plays the two–guard and is looking seriously at the Minutemen.

UMass appeared to be a lock for Everett product Shannon Crooks, but the 6–foot–2 guard, who can run the point or play off guard, is now also considering Boston College, UConn, Syracuse, St. John's, Miami,

British mother loses octuplet babies

LONDON (AP) — The British woman who lost her octuplets insisted Thursday that she did not go against medical advice in trying to give birth to eight babies.

Mandy Allwood gave birth prematurely to the first three babies, all boys, on Sept. 30, in the 19th week of pregnancy. She lost the remaining five, including two girls, on Oct. 2.

In an interview with Talk Radio, Miss Allwood said there are risks with any pregnancy and she did not regret her decision.

"There was no guarantee that I would be able to keep two babies alive, which is what they wanted me to reduce down to," Allwood said. "In my own mind, I knew that I could do it. I knew the risks and was prepared to take them."

The 32-year-old divorcee, who underwent fertility treatment, said her lover Paul Hudson supported her decision not to abort any of the octuplets to give others a better chance of life.

"If I was pregnant with eight babies again I would do it again," she said. Hudson said Allwood was doing fine until an infection caused her to go into premature labor.

Court to hear same sex harrassment case

BOSTON (AP) — The boys-will-be-boys theory of play may have reached its outer limit at a Massachusetts lumber yard.

There, according to a sexual harassment case before the state's highest court, three men say two male supervisors constantly subjected them to raunchy comments and gestures. The company argues the case isn't sexual harassment because all the men involved are heterosexual.

Same-sex sexual harassment is an issue courts around the country have been forced to address, and they have reached conflicting conclusions that ultimately may have to be resolved by the U.S. Supreme Court.

This is the first time the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court has taken up the issue.

In 1989 and 1990, Leonid Melynchenko, James Quill and Stephen LaRochelle, all now in their early 30s, worked at a West Springfield branch of the national chain 84 Lumber Co. All three eventually quit.

The men they accused, Richard Raab and Elasel Roque, were fired after the allegations were raised.

The employees sued the company, and a state judge awarded each $75,000 in 1993 on the grounds of sexual harassment.

Judge Daniel Ford ruled that the men's sexual orientation was irrelevant and that the real issue was the "intimidating, hostile, humiliating and sexually offensive work environment."

Campaign UMass set to go; money to fund key initiatives

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Campaign UMass, which kicks off on Oct. 17, will attempt to raise $125 million from private sources for the University of Massachusetts over the next five years.

"I know that Campaign UMass will be a wonderful success," President William P. Bulger said. "It will make sure that UMass is ready for this coming century."

The theme of the campaign is "To Dream, To Act, To Lead."

"Our objective is to remake the University for the 21st century, and to do that we need to strengthen its image throughout the Commonwealth, to engage alumni and friends as volunteers, and to generate $125 million in crucial funding for key initiatives," said Vice Chancellor for University Advancement Royster Hedgepath.

Financial Initiatives

The $125 million will support the following priorities:

• $40 million for faculty support to enable the University to attract and retain the best possible professors.

• $40 million for college based initiatives and research to support the programs, research, and technology that each college requires to perform at its peak.

• $10 million for students to help fund financial aid and merit scholarships.

• $30 million for facilities, possibly including a life sciences building, an engineering building, a center for visual arts, an addition to the school of management, an alumni center and an addition to and/or renovation of the Student Union building.

• $5 million for library acquisitions, facilities and technology.

The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) is presently working with the Administration, planning a new student union building.

"SCREA members are serving on a board with a very large group of people, including the Associate Chancellor for Space Management," said SCERA Student Coordinator Jason Vecchio. "We are talking about the first few steps for the organization of a new Student Union."

SCERA will be holding a Student Union Expo on Oct. 18 during Alumni Weekend. Their speakers will encourage alumni to tour the Student Union and speak with students.

"We need to try to get alumni interested in making an addition to the Student Union," Vecchio said.

As for Campaign UMass, Vecchio added, "I think that the campaign could be extremely effective for the new Student Union initiative depending on how it fits into the priorities of the administration.

"If Vice Chancellor Hedgepath meets with the donors and actively supports the Student Union, by all means it will be a successful project," Vecchio said.

Campaign UMass will also attempt to enlist 3,000 volunteers to serve as advocates of the University. A communications and marketing program will be implemented in order to improve the image of UMass throughout the Commonwealth.

Another imperative aspect of the private fundraising done by Campaign UMass involves recent legislation passed in the State House.

The legislation passed said that state funds will match the private funds raised by public higher education institutions up to $25 million per year, meaning that UMass could possibly attain $250 million over the next five years.

Off–campus students save on winter oil heating bills

By Scott Jason
Collegian Correspondent

As winter approaches and the temperature falls, many off– campus students face rising costs of heating oil.

The Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center (CSHRC) sponsors the Pioneer Valley Heating Oil Co–Op (PVOC) that brings discount oil prices to it's members.

According to Alison Cervini, Peer Housing Counselor at the CSHRC, the PVOC makes arrangements with local oil companies to lower the price of oil for it's members.

The PVOC is unique because it uses the organization of its members (the consumers), to bid down oil prices. The PVOC calls this combined purchasing power "organized consumer power in action," according to a recent publication by the Oil co–op.

The PVOC, now in its 10th year, is open to most towns in Franklin, Hampshire and Hampden counties. The annual fee to be a member of the PVOC is $5 per household and $15 for agencies and commercial businesses.

However, up until Oct. 31 the annual fee is free for students, faculty, and staff at the University of Massachusetts.

On Oct. 9, the current market price of oil was $1.029 per gallon, PVOC members pay $1.009 per gallon, according to Rita Brzozoski, a representative at National Heating.

The average household oil tank holds around 275 gallons, so on this particular day PVOC members could save $5.50 on a tank filling. But, according to Cervini and Brzozoski the oil prices and the savings fluctuate from day to day.

The CSHRC in conjunction with the Center for Ecological Technology (CET) negotiates a written contract with local oil companies that guarantees them to provide a discount.

Oil co–op members receive a price that is derived from the dealers wholesale cost plus a fixed mark–up. The mark–up is what the oil dealers are obligated to maintain.

Throughout the year, the CSHRC monitors the oil prices to make sure oil companies comply with the agreement.

According to Cervini, both the consumers and the oil companies benefit from the co–op.

"The oil companies are given more customers and the customers get a discount," Cervini said. In addition, Cervini said that the reason there are not more members is because "not many people know about the PVOC."

"Something Every Friday" returns; film, dance, comedy to be featured

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Correspondent

The weekly entertainment series, "Something Every Friday," made its return to the University of Massachusetts last Friday night with a performance by comedian Teddy Smith followed by the film Dragonheart.

Sponsored by the Campus Activities Office, the event marked the beginning of a year long entertainment series.

Jose Tolson, of the Campus Activities Office, began this program last year with $50,000 grant from Auxiliary Services and the office of Tom Robinson, Vice–Chancellor for Student Affairs.

According to Tolsen, a consistent schedule of events will attract more students.

"We wanted to do something predictable, so that students would know that every Friday night there was something fun going on in the campus center complex," Tolsen said.

"Something Every Friday" is actually a two–part event, with a performer going on at 8 p.m., followed by a feature film at 10 p.m.

The performers range from singers, dancers, comedians, jugglers and even a hypnotist.

"We try to put on as wide a range of events as possible — the essence is to present a program series that reflects the make–up of the campus as a whole," Tolsen said.

Most of the programs will be held in the Blue Wall, in order to prevent conflicts with student–run programming in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Approximately 400 students attend the program each Friday night, with students having the option of coming for either one or both parts of the program.

Three students, Melissa McPherson, Carrie Redin and Kimberly Ingram, assist Tolson in running the program.

"We do the publicity for all the performances, and at least one of us is in attendance on Friday night to introduce the performers and to run the film," Redin said.

"We also help decide on the acts and work out details with the agents," Redin said.

McPherson said the staff was pleased with Friday's performance.

"It was good — it could have been bigger, but it was good for the first performance," McPherson said.

McPherson also noted that the staff is always open to student input.

"We try to get as much input as possible — we want to pick movies that everyone wants to see," McPherson said.

"Just stop by the Campus Activities Office and tell us what you would like to see," McPherson said.

The performers for the rest of October are the hypnotist Astonishing Neal followed by the film The Craft on October 11.

Singer/songwriter Lisa Richards will also perform, followed by The Nutty Professor, starring Eddie Murphy, on Oct. 18.

Comedian John Bush will entertain the crowd, followed by John Travolta's recent drama, Phenomenon, on Oct. 25.

For more information, stop by Room 416 in the Student Union or check out the Campus Activities Website at http//www–unix.umass.edu/–jtolson/calendar.html.

Nasim lectures on gay issues

By Richard James
Collegian Correspondent

In the Campus Center yesterday afternoon, famed Pakistani poet Ifti Nasim gave a lecture entitled "On Being Gay and Creative In South Asian Culture." The lecture was sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Stonewall Center.

A recipient of an honorary doctorate of literature from the World Peace Academy in Delaware and the prestigious R.N. Tagore Award, Nasim read excerpts from his latest collection of poetry, Narman, and held a question and answer period.

Chronicling the experiences of South Asian men, Nasim's poetry reflects on the alienation and repression of South Asian gays and lesbians.

"We are like sweet meat put upon a tray in a shop and a big bulb is shining all its light upon us. We think nobody is looking on us but everybody knows," Nasim said in answer to his friend Ali, who urged him to marry.

He then started to read his poetry and began with "For Ali," a poem in dedication to his friend who is HIV–positive.

Originally from Pakistan, Nasim who now resides in Chicago, recalled a visit that he made to Pakistan in support of the underground publicaion of his book.

He said, "I left Pakistan. The fanatics threatened to kill me, I did not want to create a fuss, so I left."

An act of courage and selflessness has allowed for him to continue to help the lesbians and gays still living in Pakistan. He has used his celebrity status in his country to help a few of his gay country men seek asylum abroad. The process requires an interview given by Nasim, and a signed affidavit after a satisfactory interview. He in fact was accompanied to the lecture by a man who had benefitted from this program.

Iftikhar Nasim spoke on campus yesterday.

Nasim was able to get his book published by a gay publisher in Pakistan. He had to rewrite the book in a short period of time in order to have it distributed underground. By the time the government found out about the book, it had sold out. He then wrote a book of poetry which had a more asexual theme, and which increased the value of his name among the book publishers in Pakistan.

Nasim spoke on the pressures put on all men (both gay and straight) to get married, and the damages caused within the society due to the repression of homosexual feelings.

"Here in the United States pedophile are those men who sleep with young boys out of fulfillment of their power issues," Nasim said.

"In Pakistan and other South Asian countries it is out of a necessity — these men were homosexuals who were forced to get married and became victims of their own society. I am against molestation of children, it is the worst crime that anyone can commit because children are so vulnerable," he concluded.

Commonwealth of Learning," which is a comprehensive document which will serve as a blueprint for the University planning over the next five years.

"Campaign UMass will help UMass become a preeminent University in the nation and throughout the world," Bulger said. "It will also help in achieving membership in the AAU [American Association of Universities]."

The resources gained through private fundraising will assist in the implementation of Strategic Action.

For instance, the major initiatives of Scott's plan, which include such items as Scholarships and Financial Aid, Faculty and Staff Roles and Rewards, Diversity and Multiculturalism, call for $7 million which could be funded by money generated through the campaign.

Strategic Action will then lead to preparation for the American Association of Universities (AAU).

The AAU is a group of 60 universities who produce more than 90 percent of university research conducted in the United States; these research intensive Universities have a powerful force in Washington D.C. in terms of attaining resources.

Also, AAU status would place UMass in a select group of 16 universities who are also Land Grant universities.

Created in the 19th century, Land Grant universities were created to make higher education available to a wider array of students coming from middle–class families. They emphasized both academic and agrarian disciplines.

Events

Campaign UMass will begin officially on Thursday at 8 p.m. A dinner featuring a performance by jazz musician Billy Taylor '75 and an address by Scott will kick off the campaign. A new UMass multi–media slide presentation will be shown.

On Friday, open classes, lectures, tours showcasing University faculty and students will be available to alumni.

From noon to 2 p.m. there will be an all–campus community celebration featuring hot dogs and music and dance by student performers.

A convocation ceremony with Chancellor's Medals presented to outstanding alumni and supporters will follow.

Also taking place at 8 p.m. is the 22nd Annual MultiBands Pops concert, showcasing more than 500 faculty and student performers.

Saturday will begin with a Homecoming Parade which will be followed by tailgating festivities including a tent party with Scott in the stadium.

The events will end with the UMass vs. Buffalo football game.

"It is very important that faculty members get involved in the campaign," said Secretary of the Faculty Senate John Bracey at a recent meeting.

He added that Campaign UMass will be crucial to the continuing success of the University.

President Bulger said that he will attend the kick–off dinner at the last Board of Trustees meeting.

10 Ways to Sleep Safe

Most residential fires occur at night while people are sleeping. Here are some bedroom safety tips courtesy of the Sleep Products Safety Council and the U.S. Fire Administration.

- Never smoke in bed. The risk of falling asleep while smoking is too great.
- Don't leave children unsupervised. Store matches and lighters out of children's reach in a locked cabinet.
- Don't place portable heaters within three feet of the bed or other flammable materials, or use them to dry clothes.
- Don't leave heaters unattended or go to sleep while they are on. Don't use extension cords with them, and unplug them after you turn them off.
- Don't run electrical cords over or under the bed, or trap them between the bed and the wall, where heat could build up.
- Never place heat–producing appliances (such as electric curlers) on a bed.
- Use only electric blankets listed by a testing laboratory.
- Discard any mattress made before 1973 (when the Federal Mattress Flammability Standard went into effect)
- Install and maintain smoke detectors on every floor of your house - including near the bedrooms, or even in bedrooms, and away from air vents. And, sleep with your bedroom door closed
- Plan and practice bedroom fire escape routes.

Third party senate candidate attacks Weld

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Susan Gallagher, a third-party candidate in this year's U.S. Senate race, has been endorsed by a group of conservatives, and she used the opportunity to unload on the Democratic and Republican nominees.

Not only does the Conservative Party candidate disagree with Gov. William F. Weld and Sen. John Kerry on abortion, but she also opposes their support for gun control, affirmative action, foreign trade agreements and growth in government spending.

"This is a culture war, and it's time for us to make a decision about which way we want this country to go," Gallagher told about 25 supporters gathered at the Omni Parker House hotel yesterday. She said the country can either continue its decline toward a secular society or return to its Judeo-Christian roots.

"I want to teach my daughter the values I want her to learn," Gallagher said. "Government has gotten too big and too intrusive into our lives."

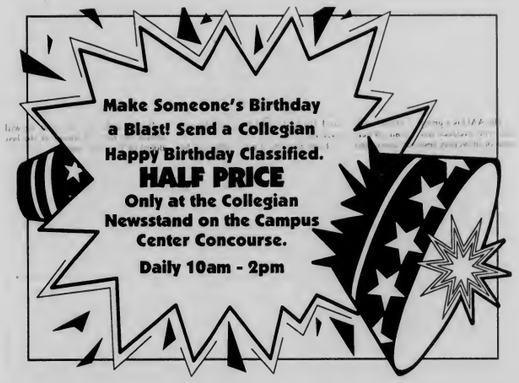
Gallagher, a 37-year-old Milton real estate broker, has been excluded from the major Senate debates featuring Weld, the Republican nominee, and Kerry, the Democratic incumbent. She also has received little mention in numerous mainstream media stories about the race.

But Gallagher is on the Nov. 5 ballot, along with Weld, Kerry and Natural Law Party candidate Robert Stowe. Some polls have shown her with about 5 percent of the vote, which could cost Weld the election in a close race.

Her campaign is clearly targeted at Republicans unhappy with Weld's liberal social policies and the overall growth of the state budget since he took office in 1991. It has risen from $12 million to just over $17 billion.

In an interview after her news conference, Gallagher said she wouldn't mind if her candidacy indirectly helped Kerry - even more liberal than Weld - win re-election.

"Regardless of who wins, it's going to be the people who decide," she said. "And to be quite frank with you, I don't want Bill Weld to bring the same policies to Washington that he brought to Massachusetts."



Gallagher also said that Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci had approached Conservative Party leaders last fall about having her step out of the race. She said she turned down the chance to meet with Weld himself.

"I was invited to go meet, I knew the meeting was taking place, but I refused to go because I didn't want my values compromised," she said.

Cellucci was out of his office and did not immediately return a phone message. Last week Weld denied any contact between the campaigns.

Practice what you scream

I still amazes me when I think back on a year ago and realize that I was one in a million (over 2 million really, but who's counting?) at the Million Man March on Washington.

And as the anniversary of the March rolls around, I can't help thinking about what real affect the March has had on my life and on the lives of the other millions of brothas (and sistas) who had anything to do with that historical event.

Humphrey brown III

For me, the March was a look at things to come. Brothas were being real to one another; not clouded by ego or pride. It meant nothing to accidently bump a brotha or scuff the tops of his shoes. We were all there in the spirit of the March and we all had an agenda. We were black men and that was all it took to unite us.

We all knew that the media's fears of the March weren't that there was going to be violence and bloodshed. Their fears were that we would come together, a million strong, and handle business. They were half–right.

The March literally, at least for me, represented a Utopia of sorts. Nothing but righteous brothas doing the work of God (Allah) and giving priority to peace and unity. Add the unification of both brothas and sistas and you have heaven on earth. The March epitomized black solidarity at its finest. Everything was peace.

And after all the speeches had been made and all the Final Calls distributed, the March ended and millions of inspired black men got back in their cars and on their buses, ready to go back and change their communities. And, as Minister Louis Farrakhan told us to go and tell everyone what we had seen and learned, I remember thinking that now America was finally going to see black men and women stand up and claim what's ours — get our piece of the pie.

Today, I wish that I had never harbored such expectations. When you build your hopes up, you run the risk of being disappointed. More often than not, your dreams of a perfect world will always fall short, because this is far from a perfect society.

Needles to say, my hopes of a Utopian, black community, after the March, fell flat on its face. Funny, what a difference a year makes.

Nationwide, it seems as if the spirit of the March has somehow faded away and now we're back to square one.

How many of us can honestly say that we are still holding true to the oath that we took one year ago?

I know that there are some brothas out there who are truly keeping it real and doing all they can to stay righteous in the midst of continued oppression and racism. Yet, these brothas are few and far between. Too many brothas are just not staying true to the plan and agenda of the March. The numbers don't add up.

It goes like this: if there were over 2 million men at the Million Man March and each one of those men went home and taught another, and another taught another and so on, we would have millions upon millions of brothas and sistas united and strong, right now. America would look at us through different eyes, because America would have to stand up and pay respects. We would have our piece and there would be nothing to stand in our way but us.

Unfortunately, that isn't the case. Mad brothas that were at the March no longer even believe in the spirit of the March. They've found that after the initial "after March" affect has worn off, they're back in their same 'hoods, dealing with the same old problems they had before the March.

It's almost like coming out of a movie theater after you've just finished watching a real intense action flick. You still have the urge to do what you've just seen in the movie, but after a minute or two you calm down and return to reality. And right there, is the problem. We seem to have this mindset that the Million Man March wasn't real. It was as if the ideals of the March were something that could only work for a day or two (a week if you're lucky) and then it's back to life, back to reality.

The idea of black men, united and righteous, is a reality. At least it can be if we truly strive for it. What was the point in even having a march if it was only supposed to mean something for one day? That isn't logical. If a million black men can come together and be righteous in Washington, D.C., we can surely be united in our own individual communities.

As we come upon Oct. 16, 1996 — I truly pray that we get another dose of the same spirit that dominated the March and had over 2 million black men screaming, "Long live the spirit of the Million Man March I"

Brothas, it's time to practice what we scream.

The headache of school laws

America's schools have a drug problem.

This isn't news. However, it is no longer the students attending the school who have a problem, but the people who run them. Recently, two different cases have occurred of school administrators suspending students for having drugs, even though the students didn't even use them.

In Ohio, two eighth–grade honors students — Kimberly Smartt and Erica Taylor — were suspended after Smartt was caught giving a drug to the Taylor, even though she never used it. The drug in question? Midol.

It gets better though. Taylor was allowed to return after a nine day suspension when she agreed to take part in a drug evaluation and counseling program that she must pay for. Smartt was allowed to return after the school board reduced her 80–day expulsion to three days as well as 10 days of suspension she had already served.

Jacob W. Michaels

Less than two weeks after, a 13–year–old honors student was suspended in Texas when police dogs sniffed drugs in her backpack. Her illicit possession? The common pain reliever Advil.

Combined with the recent sexual harassment problems caused by kissing 5–and 7–year–olds, these actions show an alarming trend in our schools.

Administrators are overreacting to rules meant to create a safe, learning environment.

The rules are there for an important reason. Regardless of personal feelings on drug use, just like cigarettes and alcohol, children should not be smoking pot, dropping acid, or any other type of illegal substance.

However, Midol and Advil are hardly the latter–day coming of heroin or cocaine. They are over the counter drugs bought for a specific purpose — relieving menstrual cramps and headaches. Chances are many of you reading this have at least taken one of these pills, if not carried a bottle around with you like these young women.

But the current mood in schools now make these crimes worth depriving students of a large chunk of their educational time.

Some administrators fear parents will sue over a supposedly unsafe environment in schools — especially in the sexual harassment cases — but for the most part these are knee–jerk reactions.

What has happened to our ability to think and act as reasonable intelligent human beings? What has happened to our ability to realize that a 13–year–old child can use Advil safely, and that regardless of what a police dog's nose may say, that it isn't an illegal drug? What has happened to our ability to say while this may technically break a rule, suspending someone because they wanted to treat a headache is not the point of the rule?

Apparently, these abilities have left us just as school boards all over the country seem to be taking leave of their senses.

The country needs to take a step back and relax. It is time to start using our common sense again.

Everyone involved in these cases knows how ridiculous it is to punish students for trying to prevent common pains. Now they need to find the common sense to be able to say these rules are written too broadly and should not be enforced in these cases.

From there, hopefully the notion will spread and we will no longer be forced to hear about frivolous court cases, chairs being bought for thousands of dollars and various other symptoms of the country's current lack of sense.

Columbus policy questioned

I am writing about the Collegian's Oct. 9th article "Columbus Rally Planned" and the page 4 editorial about Columbus Day on the same date. The Collegian's ed–op policy states "the views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian."

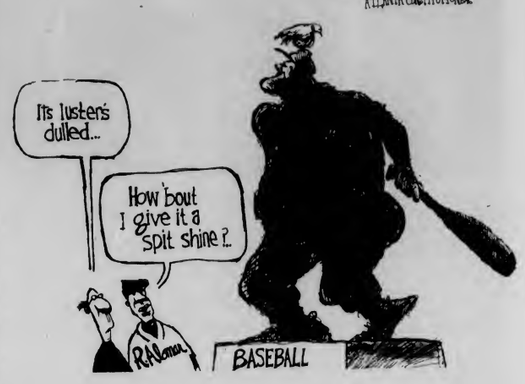
This editorial was unsigned, highlighted and boxed and placed directly under the mast–head. I conclude that it represents official Collegian policy. Apparently the "P.C." view is that Columbus didn't discover America since it was already occupied, and that he was a criminal whose arrival should be vilified and not celebrated. I disagree.

Columbus did discover America in every important respect. This doesn't mean that no human eye saw America before him. It does mean that he brought this continent to the civilized world's attention. That is, to the growing scientific civilization of Western Europe.

The ultimate result was the United States of America. Columbus' voyage led to the incredible influx of people and ideas on which this nation was built and still rests. The opening of America brought the ideas and achievements of Aristotle, Galileo, Newton and a host of others. These ideas replaced a way of life based on fatalism, superstition passivity and magic.

Prior to 1492, this continent was inhabited by primitive hunter–gatherers who wandered across the land and lived from day–to–day. There was virtually no change of growth for thousands of years; life was nasty, cruel, brutish and short. There was no wheel, no written language and little settled agriculture; there were endless bloody wars. Western culture brought enormous benefits without which, most of us, regardless of ancestry, wouldn't be alive today.



The people who built America, in particular the waves of immigrants in the 1700's and 1800's, did not come here to wallow in "ethnic pride." They embraced the essence of western civilization: that each individual is a sovereign entity with the power of choice and independent judgement. We owe ourselves no less today.

Is anybody out there?

At this point, I'm probably the only one left on campus, everyone else having gone home for the long weekend, so I'm basically writing this column for myself. Hey Nick, how ya doin'? If there are any other losers stuck here who bothered to pick up the paper, I hope you enjoy this. I'm going to take this opportunity to write about some of the things that bother me but that don't individually warrant a full column.

O.K. First and foremost: Wade Boggs. I hate that guy. What a jerk. I felt bad when the fans yelled "Margo" at him back in the good old days—, even though he was slime for cheating on his wife, but then he deserted us... for the Yankees no less. Of all the dirty, rotten, lousy, putrid, slimy, rancid... And then he gets drunk on an airplane and harasses a stewardess. Now the Yankees are going places and he's riding along with them. Damn him. Damn them. It'll kill me if they win the Series. Although at the time I thought it was cool, I no longer care that he got pantsed on "Cheers." I hate Wade Boggs.

Next: the apples in the DC. Last semester, they had signs up proclaiming that the apples we were eating were "Michigan Apples!" This being Apple Week, I assume the selection displayed before us is probably from the same state. So what? Are we supposed to be pleased we're getting apples all the way from Michigan when there are orchards right around here in prime season? I'd think a state school would want to support its own state's agriculture. Why not stimulate our economy by helping out Massachusetts' farmers?

Nicole Cournoyer

I've been told by several people that my column on the escort service from two weeks ago is hanging up in the UMass police station. Does this mean I'm blacklisted? If I call escort again, am I going to have to use an assumed name and wear a wig? If I so much as spit on the sidewalk, will they book me? I feel like I pissed off the mafia.

Maybe I'm just paranoid, but I think that escort van I saw last night was following me. I'll have to search my room for bugs now. I bet they tapped my phone. Watch what you say if you call me — Big Brother is listening.

Another thing that annoys me this semester is the cost of a new ID. At the end of last semester, my ID was in pretty bad shape. It was barely in one piece, but I figured it wasn't going to get much use over the summer so I'd wait until fall to get a new one. Big mistake. I could have gotten it for $8. Instead, I had to pay $15. Yes, that's right. The price didn't go up a buck or two. It practically doubled. Why the heck do they have to charge so much for replacement IDs? Why couldn't they have told us last semester they were going to raise the price?

A friend of mine went to get a new ID last semester and they told her she didn't need one. Her old one just needed to be relaminated. So they relaminated it and a few weeks later, it was falling apart again. This semester, she had to pay $15 to get it replaced.

Romantic movies. I always come out of them feeling like the biggest schmuck for having let myself fall for that crap for two hours. Movies are dangerous. Sure, they make you feel good for a little while, but they lie and I don't like it.

I was standing in line to cash my check last Friday and I was looking at the painting downstairs in the Campus Center by the auditorium. Perusing the painted pond, I spotted the swan sitting prettily on the water. He was looking at something expectantly; the other swan, flying to meet him. I wanted to cry. He must have been so happy in those days. Now he's just a lonely, old grump. Damn frat boys. What a bunch of jerks. Then I remembered I was in line to get money, and I felt better.

As annoying as those people who hand you pieces of paper in the Campus Center are, I feel left out when they don't give me one. For example, I was walking by the Red Cross table with my friend when a woman came up to her and asked if she would like to give blood. My friend said maybe and took the flyer the woman handed her. She just ignored me. As she walked away, I mumbled something like, "What? Is my blood not good enough for you?" I was really offended that she didn't want to leech me too.

She heard my question and turned back to me, explaining that she didn't think I was big enough to give blood. She said I looked under the weight limit. Nice save, lady.

But I was still annoyed because I'm not under the weight limit. Although I'd never given blood before, I was sure I would have no problem doing it. My pride was hurting and I needed to save it so I went to the Cape Cod Lounge to have my precious bodily fluid pumped out. I'll show them, I thought.

I ended up lying on the table for an hour and a couch for another hour because I felt so sick. But I gave my pint of blood, dammit. No one can take that away from me.

Pride is a terrible thing.

My favorite cheer–ups

If you're like me, you've been in a bad mood lately. All you want to do is skip class and sit at home, sulking about your crappy luck and how "all this work came out of nowhere." Well cheer up, chief. I thought that with mid– terms on the horizon and the rainy days piling up, it was about time for some tips on how to cheer up. So I've decided to let you in on a few of my favorite pick–me ups.

Luke Meredith

Oasis' "She's Electric"

For all of you who bought Oasis's Morning Glory because, and I quote, "Wonderwall rocks!", I suggest you let the CD run a few songs. If you do, you'll find this breezy post– grunge pop nugget to be the best thing the Gallagher brothers have ever done. A sampling of the lyrics gives you an idea of just how wacky these Manchester louts can be. To wit: "She's got a brother, don't get along with one another, but I quite fancy her mother, and I think she likes me too." Go Liam, you coked–up rock star you!

Sportscenter

I can't leave the house without watching at least one of the 10,000 Sportscenters that run each morning. Where else can you get your sports information in such a kooky fashion? Dan Patrick and Keith Olbermann rock it on the Big Show, and current early–morning darlings Rich Eisen and the existential zen master Stuart Scott make waking up a little easier. After 30 minutes with the Bristol gang, you'll feel as "cool as the other side of the pillow."

The men's bathroom on the fourth floor of Goodell

In a school as large as ours, you can find great little places if you look hard enough. You have to see this place. The urinals are made of marble, and the tiles are exquisite. I'm imagining that this is a remnant from a time when Goodell was the old library, before the eighth wonder of the world, the DuBois Library, was built. This lavatory has a soothing quality that can't be explained. It can only be experienced.

The Collegian's conservative Ed–Op writers

Oh wait, there aren't any. Sorry, my mistake.

Bull Durham

This late '80s baseball date movie about Crash Davis, an aging catcher, and Annie Savoy, a community college professor and occasional harlot, could be about the sweetest little movie ever made. And, oh the lines! Movie classics such as "Why's he calling me meat, I'm the one driving the Porsche!" and "He @#$%* like he pitches, sort of all over the place" resonate with feel–good charm and aw–shucks Americana. By all accounts, a definite pick–me up.

A good old fashioned bong hit

If you're feeling down and blue, or troubled by some foolish game, rip a nice, phat binger and then order out. You'll notice that, along with any ability to comprehend the world around you, your troubles will evaporate for a couple hours. I recommend that you fire up a bong hit before you try any of my other suggestions. You may lose a few brain cells after a couple sessions, but you lose more drinking anyways. And believe me, I know how much you drink, skipper.

Read Martin Jones' full page ads

What a wacky guy, that Martin Jones. Nothing puts me in a good mood more than reading about the end of the world, or whatever it is he's saying, every day in my Collegian. Prophecies could be the best thing to snap out of a funk, and Martin's whimsical musings on the smallness of our existence get me ready to party, baby.

Any Bon Jovi album

I'm being completely serious, people. Come on, admit it. When you flip through the radio and hear "Living on a Prayer," you leave it on, don't you? It's okay, I do too. If Tommy and Gina's lower middle–class struggles don't get you goin' though, you may need a deeper fix. If this is the case, I recommend "Runaway," "In and Out of Love" or the sentimental favorite "Wanted Dead or Alive." Sing it with me now, my children. "I play for keeps, cause I might not make it back..."

Yeah, Jon, I feel your pain.

What is National Coming Out Day?

Today is National Coming Out Day. Oct. 11, 1996. This day happens every year. It comes and goes to a lot of you like an ordinary day, uneventful and meaningless. To a gay student, today can be one of the most important days in his or her life.

National Coming Out Day was founded on Oct. 11, 1988, the first anniversary of the historic 1987 National March on Washington and the inaugural visit of the Names Project (the AIDS Quilt) to the nation's capital.

Following those events, leaders in the lesbian and gay movement decided that coming out was a basic tool for effecting change and helping to dispel negative stereotypes about gay people.

It was decided that Oct. 11 would be a day to focus attention on coming out, raising the visibility of gay people in communities and in the media.

"Coming out" is the act of an individual revealing the truth about his or her sexual orientation to others.

Studies show that most people who know someone who is lesbian, gay or bisexual support equal rights for gays. By coming out to family, friends and co–workers, individuals can have a great impact on the social and political status of gay men, lesbians, and bisexuals.

Scott discusses being black & gay

African–American writer focuses on issues of race & loyalty

By Richard James
Collegian Correspondent

"Your white lover won't save you." So read the title of an article in the black student newspaper at Yale University. Though it had been years since he stomped the halls of the prestigious Ivy league campus, acclaimed black gay author Darieck Scott, never stops learning from the impact of both that article and what he has experienced since. This is a quality which we can see crying from the pages of his book Traitor To The Race, which was published in 1995.

Darieck Scott, acclaimed African–American gay writer, spoke at Amherst College recently.

In his books and short stories, Scott deals with the issues that are faced by black gay men. Issues of identity, loyalty to race and desire are all current themes found both between the pages of his books and the experiences of black gay men around him.

"These are the issues that white gay America are not ready for," Scott said.

On Oct. 4, in the Red Room of Converse Hall at Amherst College Scott gave a lecture entitled, "A Train Wreck Named Desire: Black Gay Male Identity Politics." Scott also spoke of the process of writing Traitor to the Race.

In his lecture, Scott spoke about the conflicts that black gay men face in the community when asked about sexuality and the desire to date outside of their race.

"Often, when asked to label ourselves, we come into a conflict with our loyalties," Scott said. "If we should say that we are black then gay we are denying the importance of our sexuality. If we should say that we are gay then black, then we are considered a traitor to the race."

In recent years the most [illegible] used term when describing homosexual African–American [illegible] has been "black gay men."

"This is probably [illegible] the first identity that we come [illegible] as we are growing up would be our racial identity," said Scott as he talked outside the Hampshire Mall on a cool Saturday afternoon.

After receiving his M.A. in African American literature from Yale and briefly attending law school, Scott and his lover Steven moved to San Francisco. Now teaches a course in African American literature and works on his PHD at Stanford University.

"It's difficult to know what is going on with African– American men as a whole, many times when we get together [illegible] about gay," [illegible] said. He spoke about the [illegible] and in the relationships of father to son, and a silence "which seems to be the tradition in black culture in regards to sexuality."

I think that an older generation of black men who succeeded with the civil rights movement are looking back and thinking — I did some useless but some[illegible] ain't right."

Scott believes the [illegible] dynamic of silence within the black community is slowly eroding. A visit to a group for African– American men reassured him that their is hope for communication among black men of all orientations.

In closing, Scott commented on the exclusions of many contemporary gay African–American authors from a recent collection of short stories.

"I do not think that gay white America is ready for the issues that contemporary gay African American writers are writing about."

I love you no matter what

Jamila Beasely

I have heard many horr[illegible] came out to their parents [illegible] reject–ed by their fa[illegible] heard [illegible] met people [illegible] of their home[illegible] were [illegible], that was not the case f[illegible] I was [illegible] a household that consisted of [illegible] who [illegible] was a teacher and a grandfather who [illegible] retired chaplain in the army. I was taught two [illegible] ways to live and think in that household.

I was taught by my mother, that I was l[illegible] and I could do anything as long as I put my m[illegible]t. She said that God loved me and had a wond[illegible]an for me.

My grandfather told me that it was w[illegible] little girls to ride their bikes and that I should always strive to be number one. He stressed conformity and to never break the mold of what a little girl should be.

For years I felt torn. I felt as though I was forced to be two people. On one hand I could be anything I wanted and fi[illegible] with my mother, but on the other hand I becam[illegible] did soldier around my grandfather.

After years of feeling like I was a freak less, because of what I felt inside, I ren[illegible] her saying that nothing I could say or do wo[illegible] make her love me less. I told her I was gay with tea[illegible] in my eyes and sorrow in my heart.

She didn't look surprised or angry. She [illegible] for me with her arms as wide as the sea and [illegible] me and told me that she loved me. I was able to [illegible] mother, because of the tight relationship that we had and still have presently. I believed those wo[illegible] tender–ness she told me.

That was four years ago. Since then [illegible] ve had talks about everything. She remains su[illegible] e and completely open–minded about everythi[illegible] where visits me, we usually take a trip to Northa[illegible] of the she browses through the "alternative" s[illegible]

My point, after hearing after hearing about religious parents that shut the door to their children, is to let it be known that there are some religious parents who understand the foundation of religion, which is love and acceptance.

I write this not to say to everyone to run quickly out of their closets, though much relief can potentially be felt, but rather to let people know that there are some, if not many parents who will love unconditionally.

I doubt if I would be the person I am today if my mother wasn't as loving as she was to me that day. I doubt that I would be able to look people in the eye while speaking with them.

I am not really sure what I would have done if she had kicked me out or said I was crazy. I don't think I ever want to know. I'm just glad I remember her saying "I love you no matter what."

What Mom never told me

Jesse Woodbury

The last time I dated a girl was in the 9th grade. I broke up with her shortly after being locked in a closet for 10 minutes with her.

She sent me a note in class telling me that she wanted to get "serious" with me — a thought that terrified me, although I didn't know exactly why.

A few weeks after the bitter break–up she asked me if I was gay. Just like that. And you know what? The thought had never occurred to me.

So I went to the town library and perused the"homosexual" section to see if I qualified. I did.

Why had my mother never told me about gays? Maybe if my family [illegible] read more about the issue. I [illegible]'t be stuck having to tell [illegible] that the boy they knew for [illegible] wasn't the same person as [illegible]ught.

After reading as much on the subject of homosexuality as I could and finding out who I was.

I decided after a [illegible] that I wasn't scoring any mental health points, and so I embarked on the torturous journey of "coming out."

Friends, explaining to Uncle Butch over and over that, in fact, all those girls really were just friends and trying to convince my sisters that I didn't want to wear their clothes (honestly, they're not even my size).

I still remember vividly the conversation I had with the first person I came out to. He was my friend Rich, and I called him in a panic:

"I have something to tell you, and I hope you don't think I'm dumb for saying this, but I'm gay."

Thinking he would be picking himself up off the floor, I waited for him to rebut my proclamation.

Instead, he one–upped me with "Wow, so am I!" I think he saved my sanity.

After word got out in school that there was a bona–fide homosexual at Athol High School, I decided that I should tell my Mom before one of my cousins at school did.

Unfortunately, that's not what happened. She ended up reading a letter I had written to a teacher, but then threw away, and so found out I was gay.

She told my sisters, who told me that she knew, but she herself didn't bring it up.

That was the summer after my sophomore year. I spent most of that summer [illegible]

I felt I had absolutely no one to talk to who understood what I was going through, and I was convinced that my mother hated me.

I finally told her [illegible] at the end of that long, unco[illegible]able summer. Do you know [illegible] she told me? "Don't go out [illegible] any strange men."

If I hadn't been s[illegible]matized at the moment I would [illegible] fallen out of my seat laughing [illegible] that good advice for anyone to[illegible]?

Luckily for me [illegible] lost one good friend. The rest [illegible] my friends were completely [illegible]ing. And although my family [illegible]'t understand it, they still [illegible] was less than fun. I spent most of my energy fighting off the homophobic apathy of my principal, and ignoring yells of "fag" as I walked down the hall.

I survived high school. Now at UMass, I still have to deal with people carrying signs telling me I'm going to hell, or telling me to stop whining because I don't have human rights.

Coming out isn't something you do once — it's a life–long process of fighting your own internalized homophobia, and continuously having to tell people that you meet that you're gay because, they will assume that you're straight, and if you don't tell them, then your true self will continue to remain invisible.

Dark, violent film teams lesbians against Mafia

BOUND

Playing at the Academy of Music

Hype doesn't always [illegible] point, and this is ce[illegible] case with Bound. [illegible] like a cocktail [illegible] ches the precon[illegible]h–noir in the [illegible] a sexy and fu[illegible] till dark and vio–[illegible] of lesbians and the [illegible]

[illegible] title sequence dissolves into Violet's (Jennifer Tilly, Oscar nominated for her role in Bullets over Broadway) closet where Corky (Gina Gershon, infamous for her role in Showgirls) is bound and gagged. Before there are too many oohs and aahs that we've discovered why the title is named so or jokes about the closet, we're presented these two women's first encounter in an elevator. Looks that smolder and mouths that drool signify these women's attraction to one another, there is no need for an after–school special sequence where anyone comes out to clear [illegible] for us.

[illegible] ot exchanges between the g[illegible] seductions of the two [illegible] and their plans to heist $2 [illegible] from Caesar (Joe Pa[illegible]o, playing the role of the [illegible] the hit) with a crazy con[illegible]his role as Tommy Lee [illegible]

[illegible] provide an intensity that many won't feel comfortable with — crossing lines of conventional shock value. This isn't a mall movie and it's unfortunate because it's one of the most inventive films this year.

Something has to be said for seeing Bound in the Valley — specifically the Academy of Music in Northampton. For those new to the Valley, the Academy is a beautiful theater that screens films, has live performances, and hosts portions of the Northampton Film Festival. The audience of Bound at the Academy reflects the diversity of the Pioneer Valley. I lost count of the people who were offended (not by the sex scenes, but by the violence) and walked out because of the lesbian cheering squ[illegible] ruckus. I'm sure that Bound would be as much of a delight if they weren't there, but it's a completely refreshing feeling. A

I never had to realize...

John Beck

I have had two lives in these 28 years I've been alive. When I was a month away from my 21st birthday, I had a bad car accident on my way to work. As well as puncturing my lungs and damaging nerves in my left arm and leg (they were both paralyzed for a few months), I had a severe brain injury. I was in a coma for several days, and when I "got out" of my coma I was in a vegetable state with no memory and very limited awareness.

My boyfriend at the time had [illegible] hard time with that, as well as every[illegible] who knew me. [illegible] gotta love a woman who [illegible] to have sex with you [illegible] past life, and the start of my new one. I did come back from (mentally) an infant's perspective.

I was in hospitals for 3 months, the first month at Baystate Medical in Springfield. I did not speak. When I was at Baystate. Though my family and friends came to see me almost daily, I was a blank slate, with no memory of anyone or anything.

When I was well enough I went to Spaulding Rehabilitation Hospital in Boston where I had daily rehabilitation: physical, occupational, and when I started mumbling, speech therapy as well. After two months I was deemed well enough to go and live at my mother's home outside of Boston. I went back for out– patient therapy for six [illegible] after I was discharged.

The reason I have told you all of this is to say at no time in my recovery from my brain trauma did I need to relearn that I am gay. I had to relearn everything else, my name (given to me at birth, not really a part of me), who my family was, my friends, my boyfriend, how to speak, and how to walk. Once my left hand worked even slightly, I went back to writing with it as I am a left–handed writer. In the same way, when my mind worked well enough to enter in such thoughts, I was romantically/physically interested in other men.

At Spaulding, even before I was clear my name is John, I remember feeling an intensity in my roommate Eric in a sexual way, not that anything ever happened between us in a physical way, he was kind of a jerk.) No, I didn't find this out [illegible] pass at him, he was [illegible] guy. I may have [illegible] attracted to him as a [illegible] but as for who he [illegible]s... blah.

This experience has made me sure with no doubts who[illegible] kind of people I am interested in, as has shown me I am gay as I am tall, tanned and have brown hair.

I am an out fellow, meaning I do not hide the fact I am gay, and am not shy about speaking up if people are being closed or stupid about Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender issues. If people don't deal with that, I am not sorry they're not in my life. Well, I am sorry they don't deal, [illegible] not sorry to live my life on people who can't accept me for myself. I never chose to be gay, but I have chosen not to apologize or feel bad for being myself.

Find yourself. Celebrate yourself, whoever you may be. Don't be afraid. Being gay or lesbian or bisexual or transsexual is however you [illegible] it, and it can be a wonderful life.

Deftones rush in with adrenaline

Deftones set to play Pearl St. this weekend

The first thing noticeable about the Deftones' debut CD, Adrenaline, is how quickly buzzsaw guitars and screeches of anger can turn into ambient clean tone and whispers, or be slightly inflected by funk and hip–hop. The Deftones are very much a hard–hitting metal and hardcore band, but they aren't opposed to throwing in bits and pieces of other styles into the mix.

"I think one of the best things we have going for us is our dynamics," frontman Chino Moreno said. "There's never too much of anything. It's not like there's a really heavy song and then a real soft song. Each of our songs contains many different levels."

The 4–year old band made up of vocalist Moreno, guitarist Stephan Carpenter, drummer Abe Cunningham and bassist Chi Cheng come from the rising music scene of Sacramento, Calif.

"Sacramento's a killer music scene," Carpenter said. "But, it's just not a great club scene. There's like one good club and a couple other places, but people really don't go out there much."

So the band found refuge playing in the Bay Area, Reno and Los Angeles, quietly building a following and playing with such diverse acts as Bad Brains, Korn, L7, Quicksand, Anthrax, White Zombie, Pantera and most recently 311 (supporting them in their recent visit to the Mullins Center).

Live, the band is one of the more energetic and intense young bands around. Immediately the attention goes to frontman Moreno who throws himself into his lyrics and around the stage and sometimes into the crowd.

Adrenaline captures some of this live intensity in the studio with 11 songs of personal anguish which never let up for a minute. More importantly the disc displays the Deftones' softer side with cuts such as "Fist," which is downright epic and soaring.

Ska band performs high energy show

THE SPECIALS
Pearl Street
Oct. 7

The Specials, in a debut show to promote their new album, premiered at Pearl Street on Monday night. From the start, it was a high energy show that had the masses dancing through a repertoire of past and present hits.

Johnny Too Bad and the Strikeouts started off the night with a strong horn line and a frenzy of musical melee. The lead singer, with his especially unique voice, pulled the band through a set of strong and promising ska tunes.

Schieprock, the second opening band had its roots more in the punk rock genre of music. They literally rocked the hall with a suffocating bass riff that obscured the lead vocals and as well as the other instruments. Few of the songs deviated from the normal punk characteristics; loud vocals and basic chords on the electric guitar. It was interesting to see them try to incorporate ska into their music merely by bringing in a lighter guitar riff. Still, it got the crowd skanking, even if they were just warming up for the Specials.

Neville Staple, on lead vocals for the Specials, began the set with "Navarone," a favorite among ska fans. What followed, like "Dawning of a New Era," "Do the Dog" and "Rat Race," wrapped up an era of greatest hits that permeated the late '70s and early '80s.

On their new album, titled Today's Specials, the band paid homage to their influences and inspirations. Songs from this cover album, such as "Simmer Down," a Bob Marley remake, were modernized and energized with horn solos and vocals alike. "Take 5," a Paul Desmond jazz classic, had a muffled trumpet to solo its musical greatness.

Regardless of the promotion of the new album, the Specials didn't leave the fans without their favorites. "A Message to You Rudy" and "Monkey Man," as well as "Concrete Jungle" and "Gangsters" may have been bottom on the set list, but they finished off a musically great show.

Garmarna kicks off tour in Noho

By Daniel Bodah

GARMARNA
Oct. 8

Garmarna navigates the common ground between rock and folk — simple, accessible song structures and powerful, direct performance. Recently featured on the front cover of Billboard magazine, the band is akin to Dead Can Dance; both groups bring traditional songs from as far back as the medieval era into the realm of contemporary alternative rock, while managing to preserve the integrity of their folk– music roots. Tuesday night revealed a cross–section view of this up–and–coming Swedish band's continuing evolution.

The five members of Garmarna took to the stage with an array of apparently innocuous acoustic instruments — violins, viola, lute–guitar, guitar, flute and hurdy-gurdy. However, this is definitely an electric band; the instruments are all wired and played loud.

The band began with two instrumentals, the second of which was cut short by an equipment failure. After a few awkward moments, singer Emma Hardelin joined the rest of the group onstage for one of the band's most popular tunes, "Mother and Daughter Punished."

Garmarna's stage presence needs some improvement. While violinist Stefan Brisland–Ferner, lutist Gotte Ringqvist and drummer Jens Huglin held their places with ease and played passionately, Rickard Westman barely attracted notice with guitar on the sideline. Hardelin, riveting with her powerful, clear voice, is unfortunately a bit stiff and looks uncomfortable on stage.

As the show went on, however, the band loosened up. Amplified and distorted violin lines, unique drum approaches, and the incredible spectacle of a grimacing hurdy-gurdy and lute face–off reminiscent of Van Halen, blew away the former awkwardness. Once they get cooking, this band can really rock.

On "The Werewolf Song," Brisland–Ferner produced haunting notes on the hurdy–gurdy while Huglin pounded out a quick rhythm underneath Hardelin's panicky singing. Closing with a medley that featured Hardelin soloing a traditional lullaby as well as a piercingly beautiful call–and–response with Ringqvist on flute, the band came back for two encores. The second encore ended the evening upbeat with rowdy party–song "Hailing from Macedonia."

Quality music and a willingness to experiment make Garmarna a band to watch for.

A ONE ACT STAND
Curtain Theater

Jamie Belisle and Ron DesRosiers in The Wibbly, Wobbly, Wiggly Dance That Cleopatter Did

Powerful performances and touching screenplays produced a wonderful evening of theater Wednesday night. The audience was treated to a vast array of talent during the course of Overruled, The Field and The Wibbly, Wobbly, Wiggly Dance That Cleopatterer Did — three one–act plays.

The small size of the Curtain Theater gave the show a sense of distinctive personality. A simple yet adequate stage set the mood for the evening. Few props were used allowing audience members instead to rely on imagination.

Overruled is a light comedy centering on a bizarre love circle between two married couples. Taking place in a seaside hotel in England, two hilarious conversations occur as the audience witnesses two couples straying from their spouses. Questions of love and passion arise yet cannot be completely answered.

The audience's laughter was subdued as the second performance, The Field, began. It is a powerful drama portraying two soldiers crossing a mine field. With every step, a joke was told to lighten the mood of the highly stressful situation. Tension and drama could be seen each time a foot was placed upon the ground. Throughout this ordeal the bond between the two became strong, to the point where they thought of each other as brothers.

The mood lightened once again as The Wibbly, Wobbly, Wiggly Dance That Cleopatterer Did took center stage. This play questioned two men's sexuality during a late night discussion. Light and comical lines hid a sad storyline, however. Coming to terms with one's own sexuality and feelings of loneliness were explored and brought to light.

The sold out crowd Wednesday night left the theater after feeling many emotions. Happiness, sadness and pity are just to name a few. The directors, cast and crew molded together to create a thoroughly entertaining night.

Hallraker new kid on the hardcore

Keepin' it Real
Adam Dlugacz

If you missed H2O and Farenheit 451 last Thursday night at Pearl Street, you missed out on two of hardcore's best shows. The show was fun and energetic and a good time was had by all. One complaint — why does everyone feel compelled to stand on stage? You could barely see H2O because there were so many kids standing there who were not even diving or singing along. Todd Morse of H2O put it best when he said, "It was a great show except for the incredible shrinking stage phenomenon."

Here in the Amherst–Northampton area we have a fairly healthy scene in terms of shows and attendance. However we seem to be lacking when it comes to local bands. Hallraker is the obvious exception — a band made up of Jim Belisle on vocals, Jim Shea on bass, Jim Pion on guitar, Paul Carlton on guitar and Chris Bevilacqua on drums are an exception to the above.

Hallraker was formed last year over spring break when Bevilacqua and Belisle decided to form a band playing the style of hardcore that they most enjoy.

"We wanted to play old school punk, like Black Flag. We're so sick of 'my girlfriend dumped me' crap," Bevilacqua said.

Hallraker, featuring members of Temperance, Holdstrong, Cannon and Unbound, played their first show on May 16 at Pearl Street with the Marshes and since then have played at least three shows.

"Jewel, Alanis Morisette, the Bad Brains, Descendents, Black Flag and iceburn have all had an impact on us," Bevilacqua said.

Pion feels a little bit differently.

"Jesus was a big influence. Actually if SST and Revelation Records had sex, Hallraker would be their offspring," he said. "[Where] punk and hardcore meet there's a blurred line — that's us. We're a little bit of everything."

Hallraker also takes a different approach to writing their lyrics.

"A lot of stuff Belisle writes is not typical. We're not writing about the typical 'my girlfriend dumped me.' It's stuff people can relate to — everyday things," Bevilacqua said.

Hallraker seems to have a bright future ahead of them. Despite the fact that due to Pion's shortcomings (their Maverick Record deal was called off), the band will be releasing a seven–inch single on Pindrop and Psych records. They're also trying to play out as much as possible. They have an upcoming show at Trinity College on Oct. 17 and this weekend they plan to rock Van Meter with Bane and Line Of Fire on Saturday.

Bevilacqua may have claimed, "We want everyone to hear our music and we want to get rich," but at the same time Pion reminds us that Hallraker is "keepin' it real, keepin' it local, representin' the homefront."

UMass cross country heads to Paul Short Invitational

By Corey P. Goodman
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's cross country team eagerly returns to action this weekend when it competes Saturday in the Paul Short Invitational at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa.

UMass' first big invitational of the year will host a field of 31 teams from several districts. The upper echelon of teams in attendance will include No. 5 Georgetown, No. 7 Villanova and No. 20 Penn State.

"Georgetown is unbelievable," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "They are one of the deepest teams in the country. They can run their front seven or their back seven and still come out atop the field."

Villanova is impressive and showed it by winning the Meet of Champions in the Bronx two weeks ago; and the Lady Lions from Penn State have another strong team that's expected to outrun the Minutewomen.

But who will be the surprise of the week to come up and challenge UMass?

"Watch out for Cortland," LaFreniere said. "They are a very strong Div. III team. In fact, they'll be stronger than most of the Div. I teams there."

UMass star Rebecca Donaghue will also be looking over her shoulder for Connecticut's standout runner Danyelle Wood. Though Donaghue has gotten the best of her the last few meets, an obvious rivalry is felt when the two teams tangle.

In addition to UMass, the Atlantic 10 will also send LaSalle, St. Joseph's and Rhode Island to round out the field in Bethlehem.

Tough competition won't be the only concern for the Minutewomen at Lehigh, they will be running a very challenging course.

"It's a difficult course," LaFreniere said. "There is a lot of uphill running and it's all on rolling grass. After a fast, dirt– covered course at Van Cortland Park [Meet of Champions], Lehigh's soft grass is slow and will wear down the runners," LaFreniere said.

The Paul Short Invitational only allows seven runners per team. A simple math equation and basic knowledge of the sport tells you that for UMass to succeed this weekend in a field of 200+ runners, they'll have to push their times up and bridge the distance between each runner.

LaFreniere has seen signs of this potential the past few weeks.

"Rebecca had a virus at Van Cortland Park and couldn't perform her best against the Villanova runners," LaFreniere said. "She's in top form right now, ready to run atop the pack."

Senior Katie Greenia has been another key runner for the LaFreniere's Minutewomen.

"Katie had a fantastic race at Van Cortland Park, running very close to the Villanova top four," LaFreniere said. "She's had super workouts all week, and she's a very strong runner, so the hills won't bother her."

Junior Christy Martin and senior Molly Dunlap have also shown signs of promise.

"Molly ran the race of her life at Van Cortland (23rd place, 19:35)," LaFreniere said. "Whatever she did two weeks ago, she'll need to do again."

"Christy Martin has been one of our most consistent runners," LaFreniere said. "She has to remain ten seconds or better off Katie's pace for us to be successful."

The Raiders meanwhile are 6–7 this year after dropping a 1–0 decision to Detroit on Wednesday in their last action. In the only meeting ever between the schools, UMass crushed Wright State 7–0 in last year's UMass Classic. In that match the whole team saw playing time with UMass running up its highest goal total since Rudy took over the program in 1988.

Powell had a pair of goals against the Raiders last year, while Rutherford and Tina Lightning also found the back of the net. Someone will have to step forward starting this weekend to fill a mighty large pair of Reeboks, and Rudy feels confident that his squad will pick up the slack.

"When potential meets opportunity great things can happen," the coach said. "With out our leading scorer someone's going to have to step up and I think it will be more than one. Everyone's going to have to step up and I think they will."

weekend with a 3:30 p.m. contest against Dayton and then wraps things up with 1 p.m. battle against Xavier.

Dayton (5–5–1, 4–1–0 A–10) travels to Amherst with a full head of steam after last weekend's dual sweep of St. Joseph's (5–2) and Temple (3–2). In the standings, the Flyers are tied for first in the A–10 along with Rhode Island with 12 points.

Though with a young club (12 freshman and six sophomores out of 26 players) chances are UD will be up for Friday's match, after it travels to Rhode Island in an attempt to break its tie with the Rams. in addition, Flyers coach Dwayne Schaffer is in his first year at the helm, coming from Clemson where he was an assistant since 1993.

The Minutemen will have their eyes on No. 12 Scott Rooney who is at the peak of his game. Last weekend, he scored twice and assisted twice with 10 points on the year.

"Dayton is very direct in how they play," Koch said. "They will get the ball forward as fast as they can and try to create chances from having the ball bounce around in front of the net."

In Saturday's contest, Xavier comes to town on the heels of a 1–0 win over Kentucky on the road.

"Xavier is very dangerous offensively, but suspect defensively," Koch said.

Baltimore protests interference from Game 1 outfield blunder

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Baltimore Orioles formally asked acting commissioner Bud Selig and AL president Gene Budig to overturn their Game 1 loss to the Yankees, saying "the best interests of baseball demand no less."

Pressing their claim that the game-tying, eighth-inning home run by Derek Jeter should be overturned because of fan interference, Orioles owner Peter Angelos and general manager Pat Gillick submitted a five-page written protest yesterday that included five attached pages of newspaper articles.

Baltimore asked that Game 1 of the American League championship series be resumed with the Orioles ahead 4-3 in the eighth and Jeter at the plate.

"The best interests of baseball demand that this wrong be righted," the Orioles said. "The best interest of the baseball fans is not served by the silence on the part of those who have a responsibility to speak. Here, millions of fans, the national media and umpire himself have already spoken. It is time now for the commissioner to safeguard the integrity and restore public confidence in baseball."

Jeter's homer, pulled over the wall by a 12-year-old fan on Wednesday, tied the game 4-4 and New York won 5-4 in the 11th on a home run by Bernie Williams.

"This is an extraordinary protest based on extraordinary events," the protest said. "A human error by the umpire, making a mistaken call, would not justify the attention of the commissioner and league president. A fan impulsively interfering with the play would not justify your attention. This protest, however, strikes at the very essence of major league baseball: integrity and consistent application of the rules."

When Orioles manager Davey Johnson discussed the protest after Wednesday's game, he said it was based on the lack of security in the right-field seats, not the blown call by umpire Rich Garcia. Johnson said before the game that he had been assured there would be enough security in the outfield corners to prevent fan interference.

Under baseball's rules, protests are not permitted on judgment calls. But a lack of security was not addressed in the written protest.

Volleyball continues trip; will play Xavier, Dayton

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's volleyball team continues its road trip this weekend with matches against Atlantic 10 opponents Xavier and Dayton. The Minutewomen currently are 15–4 overall and 4–2 in conference.

The Xavier and Dayton volleyball programs both joined the A–10 last season. They have made immediate impacts on the arrangement of the upper ranks of the conference, but have failed to defeat Massachusetts, posting a combined 0–4 record against the Minutewomen.

"Rhode Island, UMass and certainly the newcomers Xavier and Dayton have the ability to contend in the A–10," St. Bonaventure coach John Wasielewski said, after his team recently lost to the Minutewomen. "They're all good teams. It should be a dogfight."

Massachusetts began its five game road trip last weekend with games against LaSalle, Temple and Fordham. LaSalle presented a limited challenge, practically diving out of the way of the Minutewomen's attack. Junior middle blocker Michelle Paciorek led the way, hitting a stellar .538 with 10 kills, three service aces, and three blocks.

The Temple Owls came out timidly at first, dropping the first two games of the night–cap 15–13 and 15–12. The Owls turned it around in the third game, riding the support of the home crowd to a five game victory over the fatigued Minutewomen.

Against Temple, Paciorek once again put up good numbers, hitting her career high 23 digs with five kills on the side. Senior Dionne Nash posted 17 kills and 13 digs in the losing effort.

Against Fordham, the Minutewomen pulled it together winning the four game rumble in front of a crowd of 50 in the Bronx. Sophomore setter Katie Pearce led the way with 56 setting assists, and junior Lesley Nolan followed closely behind with 12 kills and 15 digs.

Massachusetts lost the first game to the Rams 15–13, but maintained its composure, sweeping the next three games 15–8, 15–2, 15–11. Senior Dionne Nash assumed her usual leadership role with 21 kills, three service aces and seven digs.

The tandem of freshmen Jill Meyers and Sarah Watters contributed solid performances over the course of the weekend. Against Fordham, Watters

The season kicks off with a pair of tough matches. First up is the Maui Invitational and host Chaminade. If the Minutemen get by their Hawaiian hosts, they will face a squad from a challenging field which boasts the likes of South Carolina, Virginia, California, LSU, Iowa and Kansas.

From there, UMass takes to Chicago's United Center where it will mix it up with Georgetown in the Great Eight Tournament.

Also on the non–conference slate for Bruiser and company is Jerry Tarkanian and Fresno State, Wake Forest, North Carolina, Connecticut, Boston College and Maryland.

Add into the line–up a conference schedule which includes the likes of George Washington and Temple, both of which will likely boast a preseason national ranking, and the Minutemen should have their hands full.

Clearly this is a schedule Flint's predecessor ironed out. When asked if he has been in touch with Calipari, Bruiser said, "I talk to him about three or four times a week, and I run some things by him from time to time. He tells me to go out there and be myself and go with my instincts."

In the next month, all the analyzation and speculation will be thrown out the window. When the first tip–off is set in Maui, there will be bugs that will need to be ironed out in the Minuteman game, but if yesterday's tone of the team is any indication, Flint and company are well–prepared.

Orioles take Game 2 from Yanks, 5–3; series even as they head to Camden Yards

By Tom Withers
Associated Press

NEW YORK — There were no 12-year-olds to foul things up for the Orioles this time.

Rafael Palmeiro hit a two-run homer in the seventh inning yesterday, lifting Baltimore to a 5-3 victory over the New York Yankees to even the American League championship series at one win apiece.

Palmeiro's shot to right-center off loser Jeff Nelson snapped a 2-2 tie and gave the Orioles a reason to celebrate less than 24 hours after a possible win in Game 1 was stolen away by a 12-year-old Yankees fan.

The youngster, Jeff Maier, had leaned over the right-field wall and interfered with Orioles' outfielder Tony Tarasco in the eighth inning of Wednesday's game, turning a routine flyout into a game-tying homer by Derek Jeter. The Yankees went on to win the game 5-4 in 11 innings.

Maier brought his glove to the game again, but sat with his family behind the Yankees' dugout and could only watch Palmeiro's drive sail over the wall along with 56,432 others.

The best-of-7 series shifts to Baltimore's Camden Yards for Game 3 tonight. Jimmy Key will start for the Yankees against Mike Mussina.

With the score tied 2-2, Roberto Alomar doubled down the left-field line with one out in the seventh off Nelson. Palmeiro, who went 3-for-3 with a homer in Game 1, followed by hitting a 3-1 pitch over the wall in right-center.

Baltimore starter David Wells pitched out of serious trouble in the fifth and sixth innings before leaving with runners at first and second in the seventh. Wells gave up eight hits over 6 2-3 innings for the win, raising his career record at Yankee Stadium to 10-1.

Todd Zeile also homered for the Orioles, who set a major-league record with 257 homers in the regular season and have continued their long-ball barrage in the postseason. Palmeiro's shot was Baltimore's 13th in six playoff games.

The Yankees cut it to 4-3 in the seventh on Cecil Fielder's RBI single off reliever Alan Mills. But the Orioles got an important insurance run in the eighth on Alomar's sacrifice fly.

With Brady Anderson at third, Alomar lifted a ball down the right-field line. Right fielder Paul O'Neill caught it in foul territory but couldn't make a play on Anderson.

The Yankees, who had rallied to win their previous four postseason games, threatened to come back again in the ninth. Jeter singled off Randy Myers and with one out Bernie Williams walked. Armando Benitez came on and got Fielder to pop up for the second out and got Tino Martinez on a routine fly ball to right for the save and end the 4-hour, 13-minute game.

Wells was originally slated to start Game 3, but was moved up because of Tuesday's rainout. The left-hander entered the game 13-5 in career starts against New York.

After giving up two runs in the first inning, Wells settled down and limited the Yankees to one hit over the next three innings before Joe Girardi tripled to open the fifth.

Girardi sliced a ball into the gap in right-center and hustled into third with a headfirst slide just ahead of second baseman Alomar's relay from short right field.

Wells, though, left Girardi stranded by striking out Jeter and Williams, and getting Fielder on a routine grounder.

Wells teased the Yankees again in the sixth, allowing Mariano Duncan's one-out double before striking out O'Neill and Charlie Hayes.

The Orioles had loaded the bases in the first and sixth off New York starter David Cone, but couldn't push a run across. Cone had thrown 107 pitches entering the sixth inning before Cal Ripken and B.J. Surhoff singled and No. 9 hitter Chris Hoiles walked with two outs.

That brought New York manager Joe Torre out of the dugout. With the bullpen door ajar and the Yankee infielders gathered on the mound around him, Cone convinced Torre he was good for one more batter.

Cone allowed five hits with five walks and five strikeouts in six innings. He threw 133 pitches, his highest total in 13 starts this season.

Cone has had trouble in the early innings since returning in September from surgery to remove an aneurysm in his right shoulder. He walked the bases loaded in the first inning, but escaped trouble by getting Ripken to fly to center with two outs. However, Cone's fourth walk of the game in the third inning would come back to bite him.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20
Cautious optimism is the watchword when evaluating a new solution to an old problem. Don't be afraid to let your creativity have free rein—you could come up with something really spectacular. Keep your thoughts to yourself during an important meeting.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
You're ripe to do some groundbreaking, especially in your personal affairs. Do your homework before accepting a new responsibility. If the opportunity seems too good to be true, it probably is. Let a loved one talk you into something a bit wild and crazy.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
A recent milestone has you feeling excited about the future. Share your enthusiasm with your mate. A distant relative could get in touch to ask a favor of you. Don't feel obligated if it's something outrageous. Just be tactful, and things will work out eventually.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
Everything is going your way early in the week. Try to accomplish as much as possible now, because the tides will turn later. Nothing too terrible, but you'll be swimming upstream on a number of issues. Lean on a family member for some extra support.

LEO
July 23–August 23
Plan an escape from your regular routine. Learn a new skill, try a new food—anything to break the monotony. Focus on your health as the week draws to a close—a new diet or exercise routine could refresh you and prepare you for the days ahead.

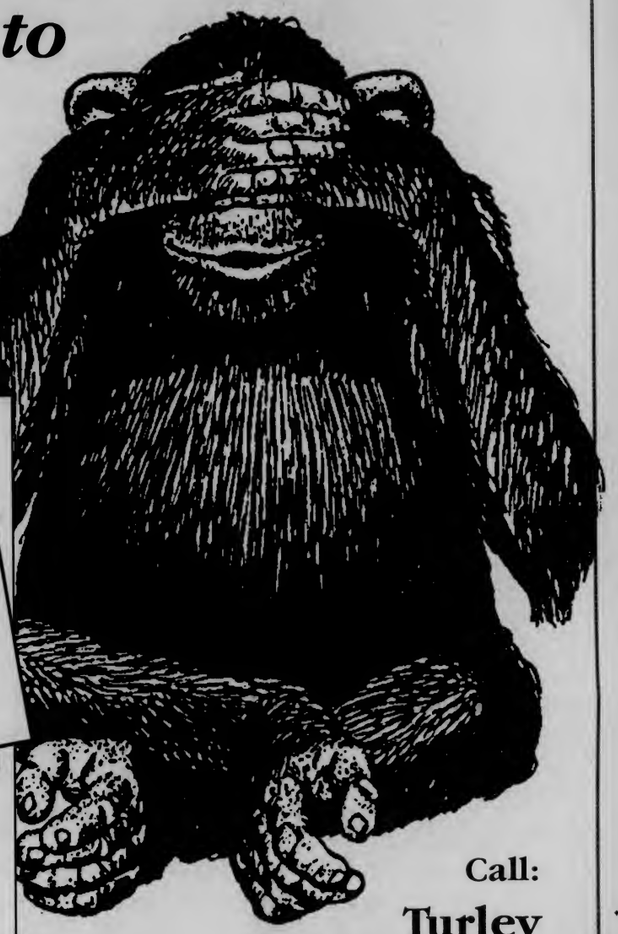
VIRGO
August 24–September 22
Something that seems straightforward could have pitfalls lurking behind the next corner. Plan ahead and listen to the advice of those who have gone before. If the stakes are low, you may be able to figure things out on your own.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
Be sure to do lots of research before making a decision. If someone seems hesitant, that person could be hiding something. Don't be a bully—instead, read between the lines to learn what's upsetting that person. Pull your own weight at work.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
Team up with an older person to form an unbeatable combination. You'll surprise yourself with your level of insight, especially in circumstances where you have no experience. Reserve the weekend for quality time with your family or a loved one.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
Difficulties this week translate into valuable experience in the days to come. The simplest solution may be the best. Be sure to look at your problems from every possible angle—and enlist some help if you think you've forgotten anything.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
It's tempting to be irresponsible this week, but if you can force yourself to get the job done, you'll reap the rewards this weekend. Clear your conscience of an old obligation, and contact an old friend whom you've not spoken to for awhile.



AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18
Family and personal matters keep you hopping in the middle of the week. If you can take the heat, you'll clear up some matters that have been smoldering for a long time. Then you'll be free to enjoy a really spectacular weekend.

PISCES
February 19–March 20
Catch up on sleep if you're exhausted—now is the time to get ahead on petty chores and obligations. It's time for some teamwork in your family or professional life. Several minds are better than just one, but you'll have to put your ego on hold.

You slam on the brakes and pull the wheel hard to the right, the sounds of horns blaring from every direction. OK, that one was too close, way too close. That other driver didn't even look before changing lanes. They call them the express lanes, but you think "extinction lanes" is really more appropriate. Today seems worse than usual. Almost like it's Celebrate psychotic Driving Month or something and you're in the parade. No matter. You're almost at the restaurant. A very chic, very you-know restaurant that you cannot afford. It is here that you are meeting your well-intentioned friend whose cousin twice-removed is in town. Cousin needs a date. Cousin is just right for you! your friend claims. Sure. That's what your friend said about Dream Date Y last month. The dream ended at the police station. Don't ask. "Sorry," you tell your friend, "I'm booked." Friend laughs. Friend knows you are never booked. An hour later you're cruising for parking. Five blocks. Six. Seven. Eight. Suddenly, you see it. A space. A real, live legal parking space. With...can it be? Time left on the meter. You slow to a stop. Flip your blinker. Stick your arm out the window for good measure. Sure, it's a tricky parallel parking problem, but hey, you're a mathematician. You calculate, then begin the backup. Suddenly out of nowhere, it comes: a cheesy little red sports car zipping into your space, the driver laughing maniacally.

Your blood pressure rises.

The jerk. You start to pull away but suddenly remember. Well, of course. You smile. Pull out your laptop. Connect the modem to the cell phone. Go. Ahh, there it is. OK, download. Now, display. Virtually out of nowhere a police officer materializes. She gestures at Mister Sports Car. "Move this vehicle now, sir." Mister Sports Car argues, but the police officer is firm. You watch as Mister Sports Car reluctantly pulls away. You smile. Log off. Power down. Parallel parking is tricky. Damn, that's good software.

One of my great, great, great ancestors was the ancient Greek who invented plywood which, as you might know, makes carpenters feel very smart when building houses.

He was pretty religious too. He practiced 4 religions at the same time.

One allowed him to have 3 wives and one allowed him to worship plywood.

I am not sure which religion was the most important to him.

But, at least, he always knew why he was praying and he had a pretty good chance of getting what he was praying for .... you know.....

UMass men's basketball ready for upcoming year

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

Next week, the speculation officially ends.

When the Madness strikes the Mullins Center floor on Monday night, the questions surrounding the Massachusetts men's basketball team will be put to rest.

If yesterday's presentation of coach James "Bruiser" Flint and his squad was any indication, the Minutemen are raring to go.

With the loss of Marcus Camby and graduation of the senior front court of Donta Bright and Dana Dingle, Flint and his staff have brought aboard a recruiting class to be reckoned with.

"They are going to have to play a large role," Flint said. "People ask me what freshmen I am going to play, to be honest with you, if my freshmen don't play, I have four guys."

In the leadership positions, the Minutemen have a core of Tyrone Weeks and the much touted backcourt of Carmelo Travieso and Edgar Padilla.

"The guards are the coaches on the floor," Flint said. "So they add leadership when you're not out there. There's only so much coaching a coach can do on the sidelines. You have to have someone out there to transform that to the other players on the court. When you have guards like that, it really helps."

Though many critics raise questions as to how close the Minutemen will come to last year's 35-2, Final Four season, Flint has his goals set out ahead of him.

"I want to win the national championship," Flint said. "I don't know if I'm going to do it this year or when I'm going to do it. My whole thing with this team is to get better as the year goes on, try to improve as a coach and a teacher.

"I don't want to say we're going to win the Atlantic 10 Tournament. I have too many young players to put expectations on them like that."

UMass has the privilege of getting its feet wet with yet another perennially challenging schedule.

Football tries to rebound against BU

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Minuteman football team will be looking to rebound from its 20-point loss last week, when it takes on the Boston University Terriers tomorrow at Warren G. McGuirk Alumni Stadium at 1 p.m.

In only their second home game of the season, the Minutemen will look to make it two in a row over the Terriers, having defeated them 28-23 last season in Boston. UMass has won the last eight of 11 meetings between the two schools, and hold an overall 25-16 lead in the series which began in 1892.

The Minutemen will look to put together a solid effort with minimal mistakes, a problem that UMass (3-2, 2-1 Yankee Conference) has faced throughout the year and which contributed to its first Yankee Conference loss of the season last week at Rhode Island.

The game between BU will be the Minutemen's forth conference game in a row. Next week they play non-conference Buffalo, and then finish the season with four more YanCon opponents.

Tomorrow's matchup features the top rushing attack in the conference against the worst rushing defense. The Minutemen have gained an average 210.6 yards per game versus the Terriers who are giving up 179.6 yards per game.

The UMass rushing attack has continued to be strong as sophomore Jim Pizano stepped it up last week in place of the injured Frank Allesio. He rushed for a career high 134 yards and two touchdowns, including the longest run in UMass history (96 yards).

The week before saw sophomore tailback Matt Jordan step up as well, as he rushed for 112 yards and two TD's. Combine them with fullback Ron Brockington who leads the team with an average of 5.3 yards per rush and close to 30 yards receiving a game, and the UMass coaching staff will once again look for a solid performance.

In the passing department, the Minutemen are averaging 144 yards per game as freshman quarterback Jeff Smith will make his second start of the season in place of junior Anthony Catterton. In his debut performance Smith was 8- for-18 for 78 yards, while rushing for 22 yards and one TD.

Boston University is having a tough time this season as it comes into tomorrow's contest at 0-5, 0-4 in the Yankee Conference. The Terriers have been outscored on the year 197 to 61, and have lost by an average margin of 39-12. The Terriers are 7-15 when playing the Minutemen at McGuirk Stadium. BU is coming off a 50-16 thrashing at the hands of Delaware last week.

Matthew Atlak is the Terriers' leading rusher on the year with 372 yards, an average of 74.4 per game. As far as passing is concerned, redshirt freshman Jason Barnett stepped in for the injured Kevin Foley last week and threw for 221 yards on 20-of-32 passing for two TDs. Foley however, is expected to play tomorrow and is listed as the starting QB.

BU averages 91.8 yards rushing and 147.2 yards passing while giving up about 180 yards in each category respectively.

Coach Mike Hodges will be looking for the 30th win of his career at the UMass helm, while BU coach Tom Masella is in his first year in Boston.

Injury Report: For the Minutemen, senior tailback Allesio is probable with a left shoulder contusion and senior free saftey Brian Mooney is probable with a strained right hamstring. Senior co-captain Kory Blackwell will play after missing the last two games with a sprained right ankle.

Broadcast Notes: The game will be broadcast live on WMUA 91.1 FM. Mike Reiss will handle play-by-play duties, while Larry Harding delivers

Minutewomen travel to Ohio to face Wright

Questions linger in wake of injury to Rebecca Myers

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

When a team has been dealt news more crushing than an over-zealous 12-year old transforming a deep fly ball into a playoff game-tying home run, the last thing to worry about is a 6-7 non-conference team that it clubbed 7-0 last year.

While that was one game for the Baltimore Orioles on Wednesday, the No. 8 Massachusetts women's soccer team must cope with a season-ending injury to its season and all- time leading scorer, Rebecca Myers. UMass must progress, as it travels to Dayton, Ohio to face Wright State Saturday.

"I'm not really worried about Wright State right now," coach Jim Rudy said. "We're focused on what we're doing here. We probably won't even prepare for them specifically. We'll just prepare our team because we have to overcome the loss of Rebecca Myers."

The dominating central midfielder was lost early in Friday's match at La Salle, and it was learned yesterday that she will indeed be out for the season with a knee injury.

Filling the void left by the two time All-American will be no easy task, and could be filled by several candidates.

Both Tarah Tokarchik and Amy Powell have filled the critical role in Myers' absence, while defender Erin Lynch played in a more attacking role during the team's 2-2 draw at George Washington on Sunday.

Another viable option is moving Robin Smith up to her natural position of center midfield and inserting Liz Rutherford into Smith's left back slot. Rutherford played solidly at defense this past summer and in several instances this year, including a starting role in a 4-0 romp over St. Joseph's.

"Our system is flexible enough that people can slide in and out of there as the game goes on," Rudy said. "We're not rigid with who has to play in there."

Turn to Women's Soccer, page 7

Fan interference causes Orioles loss

If everything went the way it should have in Wednesday's game one of the American League Championship Series, the Orioles would be up 1-0.

In the eighth inning, 12-year-old Gaffer Mairer caught what would have been a fly out by the Yankees' Derek Jeter. Instead the umpires ruled it a home run, even though it clearly was still in the stadium.

That misjudgment cost the Orioles the game since the home run tied the game. I know every time I go to a baseball game, fans are warned that interfering with a ball that is still in play calls for immediate ejection from the stadium.

• The Atlanta Braves look to be headed to the World Series once again. They swept the Dodgers and are one up so far on St. Louis.

Who will be their opponents in the final series? Sorry New York fans, but I'm going with the Orioles.

• Well it's that time of year again. The UMass basketball season is set to begin with Midnight Madness on Monday night. What can the team do this year to top last year's Final Four? A National Championship would be nice. It would prove that UMass wasn't just Coach Cal's and Camby's team.

My prediction — get ready for another Final Four appearance.

• Last weekend, Tiger Woods won his first PGA tour tournament. He finished at 27-under in the Las Vegas Classic.

• Two top 25 preseason polls, including USA Today/CNN have Providence College ranked at No. 14 with UMass at No. 22.

I know there are skeptics out there about this Providence team, but the Friars boast one of the strongest frontcourts in the nation. Senior forward Austin Croshere returns from a summer when he played against Shaq and God Shammgod controls the offense at point guard.

This is the year they make a run in the Big East and NCAA Tournament.

• While I'm on the subject of college hoops, does anyone out there dislike Alexander Koul of George Washington as much as I do? Someone needs to direct him to the barber shop.

• Since college basketball is about to begin, so is the NBA season.

Does anyone actually think the Bulls won't win the championship again this year? Sure the Knicks have added power to their line-up, but is it enough to get by Jordan and the Bulls?

Their toughest competition will come from Boston (oops, what was I thinking?), Los Angeles will be the top contender against the Bulls. The Lakers have some of the best young players in the league with Shaq, Nick Van Exel, Eddie Jones, and Kobe Bryant.

Men's soccer hosts A-10 pair as Dayton and Xavier visit

By Chris Stamm

They're back.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team makes its long awaited return to Richard F. Garber Field this weekend for two matches against the Atlantic 10's two teams from the Buckeye State.

The Minutemen (6-3-1, 3-1 A-10) come into the weekend's matches after splitting two games on the road last week, disposing of George Washington 2-0 after falling to Virginia Tech 3-1 in OT.

All time against the two Ohio squads, Massachusetts has faced Dayton once and Xavier twice. Last season, the Minutemen shutout the Flyers 2-0. As for the Musketeers, UMass dropped them once in the regular season 3-2 and then again in the A-10 Tournament, 3-1.

For the UMass offense, the tandem of junior Mike Butler and Dave Siljanovski continue to lead the way, with Butler's most recent tally coming in last week's victory over GW. However, the Massachusetts attack is hardly one dimensional.

As of late, junior forwards Joenal Castrma and Tashi Tshering, along with sophomore forward Marc Saad have scored seven goals on 10 combined shots. Castrma has connected for three goals on just three shots, Tshering two goals on three shots and Saad two goals on four attempts.

In goal for UMass, sophomore netminder Jeff Jablonski has gotten the start in the last four games when Tim Pearson went down with a shoulder injury before the St. Joseph's contest. Since then, the Minutemen have gone 3-1-0 while posting two shutouts. Pearson has been given the OK to play.

All season long, the one-two punch of Jablonski and Pearson has been a strength of the UMass squad.

"The two keepers are both playing neck and neck," Massachusetts coach Sam Koch said. "It's not a question of one person stepping it up, it's a question of who is hot and who is healthy at the time."

On Friday, UMass kicks off the Fans of the Massachusetts field hockey team waited for over a month to see their Minutewomen play a home game at Totman Field. After this weekend though, those fans go back to playing the waiting game.

The No. 5 Minutewomen host Syracuse and Boston University this weekend in the final two games of a six-contest homestand. They take on the Orangewomen at 1 p.m. Saturday and the Terriers at 1 p.m. Monday.

UMass (9-2, 3-0 Atlantic 10) has done well in games it has hosted this season, losing only once. North Carolina handed the Minutewomen that defeat, but it came on the turf of Westfield State College (in a game UMass hosted) and not at Totman.

The Minutewomen come into the weekend's schedule boasting a balanced scoring attack. Eight different players have scored for the team thus far this season, while the same number have contributed with assists.

Erica Johnston leads UMass in the goals-scored column, having netted 10 tallies. She also tops the team's points list. Johnston turned in a strong performance last weekend against West Chester when she notched four goals to lead the Minutewomen to a 7-0 victory. In addition, she has compiled a pair of assists.

Senior All-American Kyle Rothenberger and freshman Saskia Fuchs each bring a balanced offensive output to the UMass attack. Rothenberger has netted six goals and assisted on five more, while Fuchs has connected for five scores and seven assists. The two are tied in the points column at 17.

Kate Putnam has been a steady support link for the Minutewomen, proving the feeds for seven goals this season. She has also scored three of her own, including a pair of game-winners.

It has been nothing but net for Courtney MacLean, who has notched five goals, including a pair last weekend. Sharon Hughes has a pair of goals and a trio of assists, Katherine McClellan has one of each, Jen Gutzman has one goal, and Amy Ort and Christine Millbauer each have single marks in the assist column.

In goal, Hilary Rose has played every minute of Minutewoman action, posting a .907 save percentage and a 1.09 goals against average. Rose has only allowed one goal off the 70 penalty corners she has faced.

Following this weekend UMass takes to road again, travelling to Providence on Thursday before visiting A-10 foe La Salle on Saturday.

Immigrants & poor rally in Washington

■ More than 100 locals march demanding equal rights for all

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — "Abolish the death penalty," "Justice for Janitors," "Chicano power" and "Basta Ya" or "enough of this;" were just a few of the slogans written across some of the signs held by marchers in Washington D.C. this past Saturday at the Immigrants and Poor march.

Children played, socialists debated and college students shouted as various groups from all over the United States congregated at the initial meeting place of Meridian Hill park, commonly known as Malcolm X park.

They came to begin the first leg of the first ever Immigrants and Poor march on Washington. It began as a modest event, at Malcolm X park, college students, immigrants and workers from all parts of the country came carrying banners, placards and signs. At the final location of the march, Ellipse Park, the crowd grew significantly larger.

Estimates of the number of protestors ranged from tens of thousands reported by the New York Times, to 50,000-80,0 00 reported by the Boston Globe, as estimated by some march organizers.

According to the Washington Post, this is the first march in which the National Park Service did not conduct a head count. The Park Service refers to the 1997 appropriations bill by Congress, which prohibits the National Park Service from conducting crowd estimates. The bill also says that if organizers want estimates, they should contract an outside group.

Groups ranged from the Hispanic Civil Rights Defense Fund and the East Coast Chicano Student Forum, to the International Socialist Organization and the Workers World Party.

States represented included, Texas, California, Michigan, New York, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Ohio, and Delaware, New Mexico and Pennsylvania.

Traditional Latin American music, Caribbean music and Mexican songs accompanied the marchers both before and during the march, as they walked the roughly mile-long stretch from Malcolm X park to Ellipse park. Protesters danced the merengue and cumbia. People proudly waved and wore flags of various countries including Puerto Rico, Mexico, Brazil and Panama. Some protestors carried upside down American flags.

People shouted in unity from windows down to the marchers, and in the middle of the procession, the group silently parted in two as an ambulance rolled passed with sirens blaring. The sea of people stopped traffic, and when the protestors passed under a bridge, shouts of happiness, anger and frustration were deafening.

"Hey Hey, Ho Ho, Immigrant bashing has got to go!", was just one of many of the chants in both English and Spanish which the group recited.

The march ended at Ellipse park behind the White House. At the park, national march organizer, Juan Jose Gutierrez opened the event.

"We begin this historical event, by reminding America that we are Americans, because we believe in the United States Constitution. We believe in equality for all, not just for some people," said Gutierrez.

Gutierrez announced that "for the first time in American history," they were going to celebrate the diversity of being Americans by singing the American anthem in both Spanish and English.

Speakers included several congressmen, including the U.S. representative to D.C. and the president of Hispanic Congressional Caucus. Speakers representing march and union organizers also spoke.

Congresswoman Eleanor Holmes Norton, of D.C., welcomed the marches to Washington, she thanked them for coming 'to their capital to claim it.'

One of the founders of Coordinadora 96, the organizers of the march, said that immigrants have worked long and hard to survive in this country.

"We must have equal opportunity and affirmative action now, we want our children to go to the universities...We want to move up the social ladder... no child should be denied their right to free education... because

Decolonization of America discussed

By Christine Soh
Collegian Correspondent

As part of Anti-Columbus Week, a panel discussion entitled "Prospects for Decolonization in the Americas" was held Oct. 10 in the Campus Center. Mediated by Bob Andrews, the event focused on exposing the U.S. as a colonizing power and an apartheid settler state.

The three panel members, Stephen Healy of the Indigenous Support Committee (ISC), Chris Johnson of RAIL and Robert Raddock, also from the ISC each gave opening statements leading into a discussion proposed to "develop and discuss revolutionary perspectives of who governs... the Americas."

The first speaker, Healy, discussed the need for the decolonization of America. He said that there was a resistance to accept this concept especially among white people.

After citing many examples of colonization and progressive struggles of the decolonization process in Algeria and with the American Indian Movement (AIM), he said he was, "skeptical that white society [could] be anything but an enemy to the progress of an indigenous society."

Healy said that it was the cumulative effect of colonization which caused the genocide of indigenous tribes; that it was a practice which occurred over time, and that colonization is the imposition of one country's standards, government, laws and values onto another.

RAIL member Chris Johnson spoke next. Johnson, focused on the need for self-reliance and self determination among indigenous tribes of North America.

"The US is an apartheid society — separate and unequal — the oppressed Black, Latinos, and indigenous nations need to take control of their own destinies. White nation control has to end," said Johnson.

He spoke of a recent struggle over taxes where the state of New York tried to tax First Nation businesses after agreements were made that gave these tribes sovereignty over their affairs.

Last to speak was ISC member Robert Raddock who built his argument of decolonization on four acts of Congress related to indigenous peoples passed over a period of time ranging from 1887 up until the 1950s. He suggested several tools of decolonization such as thinking about what makes a nation of people and a good government and to do so without thinking the same thoughts we have been socialized into thinking.

The three panelists said they were "hoping for disagreement" in the discussion part of the program, but were met with a majority in agreement of America being an apartheid society and on the ideas of self-determination.

One member of the audience brought up the idea of continuous change rather than revolution as a means for change.

While the audience member put forth a long term and continuous solution of education and re-education, Johnson, was not moved.

"The oppressors won't give up without a fight. National liberation is impossible without armed struggle," said Johnson.

U.S. & Iraq agree to let Kurds settle conflict

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A Kurdish faction claimed new gains yesterday in a push through northern Iraq, and the U.S. and Iraqi governments were put in the curious position of agreeing on something: The feuding Kurds should settle their differences to keep the conflict from spreading.

The American and Iraqi positions did not completely coincide, however. The White House said both Iraq and Iran should stay out of the conflict, while Iraq warned against involvement by Iran. The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, which is battling a Kurdish faction allied with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, said yesterday that it was marching closer to Irbil, northern Iraq's principal city. However, there was no indication PUK fighters planned an assault on the city — which is fortified by Iraqi tanks — or that Iraq was planning to intercede.

On Sunday, PUK rebels seized the key city of Sulaymaniyah, but the group's leader, Jalal Talabani, said he was reluctant to take on Saddam's powerful military.

Dow Jones hits 6000; concerns over future

NEW YORK (AP) — What's true for the World Series of Poker and American Express Platinum Card also applies to the Dow Jones industrial average: There's no limit.

The Granddaddy of stock market averages, the one recognized by most Americans, closed above 6,000 points for the first time Monday, a powerful symbol of the U.S. stock market's strength. Professional traders on Wall Street regard the milestone as just another number. But it happened very quickly, demonstrating a mathematical trend that suggests 7,000, 10,000, 20,000 and beyond could come with even more startling speed.

"I don't know how high it can go, and you should hang up on anyone who tries to tell you," said Alfred E. Goldman, a vice president at A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc., a St. Louis-based brokerage firm.

Put another way, from the time that Dow Jones first published a stock average in 1884, it took 88 years to close above 1,000. It took 15 years to traverse 2,000, less than four years to pass 3,000 and 4,000, and less than one year to break 5,000, which happened Nov. 21, 1995.

Anti–Columbus rally held on Commons

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

Despite the fact that less than 20 people showed interest in the second annual anti–Columbus Day rally on the Amherst Town Commons, sponsors nevertheless said the event was a success.

The rally was the culmination of a week long series of anti–Columbus Day events.

"I'd like 3,000 people to show up, but any sort of opposition is good," said Brenda Lee, a junior anthropology major at the University of Massachusetts, who was an event organizer.

"For me, it's education. I think people need to be more aware and this is just the beginning of the education process," added Lee, speaking on the affects of colonization on Native Americans.

The rally included several song performances, with lyrics like "this land wasn't made for you or me" and "America was founded by the KKK."

A masked John Furbush, an Amherst resident, provided an additional attraction by wrapping himself in a blanket taped with black and yellow caution tape, and signs that read "blankets for sale."

According to Furbush, he was portraying Lord Jeffrey Amherst, a wealthy British landowner who killed off much of the native population in western Massachusetts in the 1600s by distributing blankets infested with small pox to Native Americans.

"I guess he was tired of killing one Indian with one bullet, so he thought bacterial warfare was a better way," Furbush said. Furbush led a small group of children from the Pathfinder Learning Center, in Amherst, into Jeffrey Amherst Bookstore and the Lord Jeffrey Inn.

According to Rene Rives, a 13-year-old resident of Pelham, the employees and customers of the Lord Jeffrey Inn fully supported their beliefs and that amongst themselves, they referred to him as "Genocide Jeff."

"It's good street theater," said Margaret Smith, an employee working at the Jeffrey Amherst Bookshop when the demonstrators entered the store. "I don't see naming a college or town after him is a sign of honoring him. It's just a tradition we've inherited."

"This rally is not designed to target

Fire roars in James Hall: $10G damages estimated

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

A fire which was reported early Sunday morning in the first floor lounge of James Residence Hall resulted in no injuries, but did cause up to $10,000 worth of damage, according to a spokesperson for the University of Massachusetts, Kay Scanlan.

"The fire was confined almost entirely to that lounge," Scanlan said.

Scanlan said "smoking materials" are suspected as the cause of the fire, but she could not specify as to exactly what type of material was at fault.

"No arson is suspected," Scanlan said.

Officials from the Town of Amherst Fire Department responded to alarms at 5:12 a.m. Sunday. Smoke detectors activated the alarms; they were not pulled by a resident.

About 50 residents were evacuated from the all-female residence hall.

According to Ulla Jaber, a Resident Assistant in James Residence Hall, the evacuated people had to wait outside for approximately four hours.

"When the fire department gave us the okay to come back in, they told us to pack things to last us for about four to five hours," Jaber said.

The residents then waited in nearby residence halls, and were allowed back into their rooms around 9 a.m., when the alarm system was restored. Residents are not permitted to be in a building where the alarm system is not operational.

Couches, tables and a piano were burned in the fire. In addition, the heat from the blaze cracked glass windows of the lounge.

Most of the expense resulting from the fire was caused by the labor power needed to clean the damage.

The fire was contained to the lounge area, due to the closure of all fire doors in the halls.

"Fire doors really kept the damage to a minimum," Scanlan said.

we are human beings and this is supposed to be a civilized society," said the organizer.

He also called for more focus to be placed on police brutality, citing a recent case in New York City where Antony Baez, a 29–year–old who was strangled to death by a police office in the Bronx after a football accidentally hit a police car. The police officer involved was later found innocent.—

"Brother Baez assassina–ted by an officer of the law, found innocent, that's not justice. We should have citizen police review boards, lets stop policing by the police and lets have people police the police," he said.

Approximately 110 people arrived by bus from the Five College area. The majority of the local marchers came from the University of Massachusetts but there were also Five College students as part of the contingency, as well as community members and a group of 10 Amherst Regional High School students from a program called 'Rising Generation Represent.'

According to UMass march organizer, Dominica Perez, plans for this march began three years ago. Perez was contacted after she had attended a conference in Mexico concerning Indigenous rights.

"This march is Latino organized and based on cultural, political and economic– change…we want to catapult the Latino issue to a national level and organize and mobilize Latinos from non–hegemonic groups…this is an exciting event," said Perez–.

Perez also added that obtaining the funds to pay for the busses at UMass was not easy, and that she and the other two organizers Aida Baez and Mahmood Ketabchi, worked hard to find sponsors.

UMass freshman Nuon Noeun said that it was important for him to attend and show unity. He also said that he wanted to show the government that immigrants are human beings too and should have rights just like everyone else.

Laura Lopez, a UMass senior and marcher, summarized Saturday's rally. "This event could be the start of a new era for Latinos; a new civil rights movement, a historic event and a struggle for justice. This movement represents the increasing importance and potential power of immigrants, an integral part of the American working class."

Local Puerto Ricans help rebuild

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

In an effort to help Puerto Rican residents rebuild from the damage of Hurricane Hortense, two University of Massachusetts organizations, Boricuas Unidos and Gamma Phi Sigma–Hermanos Unidos Fraternity Inc., have joined together with the American Red Cross to raise money for a Hurricane relief fund.

Over 40 members from both groups have been collecting money and will continue until Oct. 29.

"Many students on this campus are either from Puerto Rico or have relatives there. We want to do something that will help them," said Jose Escribano, a member of Boricuas Unidos and Gamma Phi Sigma.

Hurricane Hortense, which blew through Puerto Rico in September, left many people homeless, without access to food and running water.

"A lot of families have still not gotten everything back. Many do not have water or electricity yet, many power lines are still down," said Escribano.

After the major hurricane that wrecked havoc on Puerto Rico last summer, many concerned students approached Boricuas Unidos members and asked if there was anything that could be done to help.

Boricuas Unidos' Chairman Malwin Davila contacted the Red Cross to set up a hurricane relief fund. Last year, they collected $800 in a similar relief effort.

This year, the two organizations have set a combined goal of $1000. Fleet Bank will double the amount that the organizations collect.

Davila is hopeful that they will reach that goal, counting on the generosity of students, staff and faculty alike.

"About 10 members have already started to fill their second can [to collect donations in]," he said.

All of the members in Boricuas Unidos and Gamma Phi Sigma have relatives and friends living Peurto Rico.

"Hurricane Hortense hit Puerto Rico [around this time] last year," said Escribano.

"They still hadn't fully recovered from last year then they got hit again," he added.

Davila said, "All of my immediate family is there. Most of the houses are in complete ruins from flood damage. It's a really hard time for everybody there, especially since they were still recovering from last year."

A table will be set up in the campus concourse during the last week of October, which is the last week of the relief fund, to collect donations.

UMass receives mediocre report card

By Daniel E. Levenson
Collegian Staff

According to the Princeton Review Student Advantage Guide to the Best 310 Colleges, students at the University of Massachusetts rate this school as a what–you–make–it type of experience.

The book, which rates student opinions on such topics as student life and the quality of academics, gathers a wide survey of each campus.

When it comes to student life, the review said, "although the references to the legendary style of partying abound in students' accounts of their present lives, the days of 'Zoo Mass' are over. Still the social scene thrives even if the 'party school' reputation is dated."

While one student described his social life at the University as "better than sex in summer rain," the review says that students agree that "opportunities don't come to you here; you've got to go out and get them yourself."

In the area of academic satisfaction and achievement students could not reach a consensus about their opinion on the issue.

Professors are well–liked and students seem happy with the quality of education provided, however, many said in the review that they feel the University is under–financed.

The review reports that more than 70 percent of the students attending UMass are Massachusetts natives.

Students list political activism, student publications, ethnic diversity on campus, drugs and old–fashioned dating as "hot" on campus.

The most popular majors, according to the review, are psychology, hotel/restaurant/travel/administration and English.

Students complain most about the administration, residence halls, the dining commons and campus athletics.

The book offers students a guide to choosing colleges with a more non–tractional view than other college guides. In addition to information on admission requirements and policies.

The book also provides readers with student evaluations on the frequency of alcohol and marijuana usage, as well as the quality of the dining halls and the teaching.

The book was written by four individuals with extensive experience in the area of college admissions.

Zachary Knower, a graduate of Princeton University, has been working with the Princeton Review since 1989.

Tom Meltzer, a Colombia University graduate, has worked for the company for eight years writing test preparation material.

John Katzman, confounder and president of the Princeton Review has previously authored three other books in the Princeton Review book series.

Edward Custard, an educational consultant and the main author and editor of the book, has been working in the field of college admissions for close to 20 years.

Dems hold gathering in town

Big guns brought out in attempt to push candidates over top

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

On Friday night, almost 100 Democrats gathered at Amherst Regional Junior High School to show their support for Congressman John Olver (D–Amherst) and the Democratic party. With only three weeks left before the election, the Democratic party is pulling out the big guns to encourage voters to support local candidates.

Congressman Joseph Kennedy (D–Boston) was the special speaker for this event, which included State Senator Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst) acting as Master of Ceremonies.

Jay Bragg, a senior BDIC major and President of University of Massachusetts College Democrats, blasted Governor William F. Weld for proposing a bill that would have cut UMass by $19 million. "Students should know this and should be out there working for John Olver and John Kerry to get re–elected," said Bragg.

"With only a few weeks left, we have a lot of work," he added.

Mindy Cohen, a sophomore government major at Smith College, said, "I work for John Olver because we need to keep Democrats in the House of Representatives."

Rosenberg aimed his speech at students, criticizing Republicans and their education record.

"Students should understand that higher education programs are under attack by the Republicans," said Rosenberg.

State Representative Ellen Story (D–Amherst) also spoke on the event, resonating some very partisan themes.

"I can't remember a more important time to vote a straight democratic ticket," she said, calling the Republicans "reactionary."

In his address, Olver continued by attacking the Republican stance on social spending.

"Much damage has been done by the Republican Congress. They're cutting from Head Start up to higher education. The way to reverse this is to stop the Republicans control of Congress."

Directing his speech towards students, he said "we have worked here in Massachusetts to re–elect John Kerry and President Clinton. We must stop cuts in education and the way to do that is by electing a democratic majority to Congress."

In Kennedy's opening remarks, he said, "John Olver is my friend, he is relentless, he has the biggest heart in Congress. I want you to know how lucky you are to have John Olver."

Speaking on the election, he said that the Republicans are going after those with the least political power in American society.

He attacked Republicans for attempting to cut programs such as Healthy Start.

On education, Kennedy said "they cut $10 billion from student loans. You can not get a good job today without a college education. It is un–American to not help people be all that they can be. Every child should have the ability to become president."

Continuing the attack on the Republicans, he spoke at length on the record of the 104th Congress and the impacts repeated attempts to cut funding for Medicare and Medicaid. He also said that a victory for Gov. William F. Weld in the race against Sen. John Kerry for Senate would be bad for the Commonwealth.

"He'll make a speech saying I'll never cut Medicare, I'd never hurt the environment, I 'd never hurt students. Then you'd have to point out to him that all these programs were set up by Democrats and the Republicans oppose them. Say to Bill Weld we got a Democrat in Washington and we want to keep him there," Kennedy said.

Columbus exactly, but what he represents," said Mike Maestas, a 23–year–old Greenpeace representative and ethnically of the Tewa nation. "When we celebrate a holiday of genocide, suffering and absolute oppression, it shows that we've got a long way to go before we can bring it home. If this country is ever going to progress, we've got to educate prior to Columbus' discovery," he said.

"We're starting to get recognition, but its slow and needs to be picked up," Maestas added. "Pretty soon we're going to have to start collecting apologies."

Maestas, who parallels the honoring of Columbus with that of recognizing Adolf Hitler, suggests re–naming the holiday "Indigenous People's Day." Another suggestion by Rives was "Stealing Day."

Sponsors of the rally included the Indigenous Support Committee (ISC), the Revolutionary Anti–Imperialist League (RAIL) and the Maoist Internationlist Movement (MIM).

A tale of horror

Mark McGrath

Sometimes it is hard for us as Americans to truly appreciate the freedoms that are granted us and the opportunities we receive. Sometimes it takes a widely publicized story of horrific reality to bring the advantages of American life to our attention. Sometimes even that doesn't work.

Last week, many readers of Newsweek magazine were horrified to find on its pages a photograph of two men hanging and bloody, surrounded by a bunch of smiling soldiers in a town square of Kabul, the capital city. The hanging men were the former president of Afghanistan and his brother. Because no story was presented with the photo, readers could only imagine what had happened in the war-torn country. Whatever they imagined was probably a lot milder than the truth.

Since its recent takeover by the fundamentalist Mullah regime, Afghanistan has been the site of what Amnesty International calls a "reign of terror," the most oppressed group being Afghan women, who are no longer allowed to work, attend school or leave their houses unaccompanied by males.

Meanwhile, a world away, the women of our own country are literally choosing our president. Polls indicate that the double digit lead possessed by Bill Clinton is entirely the result of a strong female showing, because both candidates are dead even in recent polls of male voters.

The female vote has become so important that both candidates are catering to them, Dole even attempted and failed to book an appearance on the "Oprah Winfrey Show," a television hour viewed by an overwhelming female majority.

Because women make up more than half of the U.S. population and vote in larger numbers than men, they are the most powerful voting block in the country. Voting is not luxury provided for the women of Afghanistan, where the acting education minister stated last week that a woman is like "a rose — you water it and keep it at home for yourself to look at and smell. It is not supposed to be taken out of the house to be smelled."

Therefore Afghan women are now forced to wear suffocating garments which cover their entire bodies, including their eyes. If they refuse to comply, they are taken into the streets and beaten. The extreme measures taken have religious motivation, yet even the perceived extreme Iranians have referred to the regime as "violent, narrow-minded reactionaries."

While American women are mobilizing their power to make social changes in our society, the women of Afghanistan have no power. They need change more than anyone.

The average working woman in America does all she can to help keep her family above water. Many Afghan women have lost their husbands in one of the country's many wars; still they are no longer allowed to work to support her family. An estimated 50,000 war widows reside in Kabul. Despite pleas from United Nations relief officials to allow these women to make a living, the regime has made it all but impossible for them to work.

Examining the horrors in Afghanistan is one way of evaluating what is going on in our own country. While almost everyone has complaints about the way America is run and the structure of the government, it is easy to see that other alternatives may not be so pleasant.

The men who built this country knew what they were doing when they created a system that is adaptable and that could exist free of ties with organized religion. As cliche as it may sound the U.S. government is really set up for the people and by the people.

While the "equality" of this country isn't exactly equal, the developments that have come about over its history are astounding. Considering women had no power 100 years ago, the fact that the two major presidential candidates are begging for their favor tells you a lot about the way the American system works.

Sometimes it seems too easy to dismiss what the United States government does as unfair, but a look around will show you that it gets a lot worse.

My Lola

C.F. Gorospe

I didn't think twice about how I should approach my grandmother after not seeing her for 11 years. I wanted to give her much more than just an ordinary hug. I wanted to give her the type of hug that said so much more than just "I missed you." I didn't just miss her, I felt so much more. There were a lot of things that needed to fill in the 11-year gap that she spent without my family.

I didn't care how late it was when I got home from school that evening, I ran straight to the room where she was sleeping and I awoke her as I hugged her firmly. We stayed in the same hugging position until the heat that had generated between us exceeded the humid temperature outside. Then, we gradually released each other. We both remained speechless and just smiled at one another. For a moment, our silence assured me that despite the length of time that we hadn't seen each other, she was still the same person as before. She's still my grandmother.

She asked me if I had already eaten. I replied that I had. It was very consoling to hear her ask me this question given that it was already past midnight. If I had told her that I hadn't eaten, she would have gotten up to make me a whole meal. She always made sure that her grandchildren were well-fed. There was something profound about hearing her familiar voice. Somehow, the way she questioned me said that there was no need to express the obvious. It was immediately understood that we had a lot to catch up on and to talk about. She told me that it was late; that I should go to sleep and that we were to talk first thing in the morning.

When I got up to leave the room, I noticed that there were tears running down my face. I wondered for a moment why I was crying. I decided that my tears symbolized far more than the gladness that I felt. That night, while lying in bed, I thought about how I viewed my grandmother's arrival.

A part of me was happy and relieved that she was finally here. Another part of me feared for her. She's 69 years old. She had left everything that she owned back home to come here. It would be very different story if my grandfather hadn't passed away last year. It seemed that she was very alone here. Back home, relatives and friends always paid her a visit. She loved socializing and cooking for a lot of people. She's used to going to the market early in the morning. Over here, there's much more food than the people who would eat it. Plus, it's not really necessary that she goes to the market every morning.

The groceries were already pre-packaged in the refrigerator from the weekly shopping. She had responsibilities back home that she had to neglect. She had to detach herself from two of my cousins whom she practically raised on her own and apparently became a very big part of her. Overall, she had her piece of land to maintain. She came here so that she can petition some of her children who were still ambivalent about coming here. My grandfather never wanted to come here. He must have influenced their ambivalence.

Despite everything, I felt a great urge to be around her as often as I could. I wanted to hear her talk. It didn't matter about what, for anything she had to say guaranteed that it was something that I had missed out on. I was determined to spend most of my summer days with her, which I did.

I took her practically everywhere I went. I recall hanging out with her in Harvard Square until one in the morning once. I introduced her to every person I knew that we ran into, most of whom I hadn't seen ever since I started college. We went into every store. She particularly liked Tower Records where she purchased The Beatles' special collection. She seemed to like it in Harvard Square.

I thought that it was because she was surrounded by a lot of people and a lot of music, which was something that she had been accustomed to back home. I wanted to make her feel at home. But I knew that there wasn't much that I can do, except to be there for her. We went on many little trips together.

At one time, my whole family went camping and she thought that we were crazy for sleeping outside. She liked the fact that we were all together. We sang songs late into the night while my sister played the guitar, the way it was back home. However, every time she's at home, all she does is house chores. She told me that these chores kept her busy and kept her from loneliness.

She washes some of our clothes by hand when she knows that we normally use the washing machine to do laundry. She said that by washing the dirty clothes by hands only conserved energy, which I thought was a legitimate excuse to keep her preoccupied. She would cook so much food. She expected us to eat all of it.

Eventually, she realized that there weren't that many of us. She cooked a little less. She would tell us that she was not used to the types of vegetables and the types of meat that was sold here. She's used to purchasing fresh, live fish and fresh vegetables, not the prepackaged ones.

So my mother took her to Chinatown. She seemed more satisfied and much more determined to get her cooking done faster. To keep her preoccupied, my mother bought her a sewing machine. Somehow, she wasn't motivated to use the sewing machine. She pursued sewing, but immediately stopped. I figured that it was because she missed her old lifestyle and my grandfather.

She told me at one point that she would be doing much better if my grandfather was still alive. She said that she would try much harder to adapt to these changes. She felt that there was no need for her to try to stay here because she had so much more to do back home and her children weren't even sure if they want to come here. Overall, she felt confused and yearned to go back home.

Budgeting warrants closer look

Sam McAfee

In the wake of school budget crises spurred by diminished public investment in higher education, many restructuring plans have been put forth with a primary focus on efficient allocation of limited resources. What might pass for efficient allocation is typically decided among the upper levels of large bureaucracies.

From this top down perspective, students and departments are seen as statistical units with quantifiable features to warrant a particular level of spending. These calculations, however, fail to account for the multiplicity of situations that arise within this institution, or the personal and social aspects of student issues. In effect, as long as the numbers add up, a plan may be deemed acceptable, even if it does not reflect the realities of living at the bottom of a large, rigid bureaucracy.

The organizational structure of this University is a reflection of the market-oriented ideology which dominates both private and public institutions in this country. Private firms are rigidly authoritarian, focusing on maximization of profit without any consideration of the effects of that goal on individuals and communities inside or outside the enterprise. The compartmentalization of employees and their depiction as mere payroll numbers leads to technocratic and impersonal enforcement of the whims of powerful interests, generating often intense alienation and frustration in individual workers.

The form of representative democracy with which we must contend also inherently reduces diverse groups of people into their mere market values and keeps at a distance those constituencies that might just as well govern themselves with greater sensitivity to their particular environment.

UMass is an extension of the state government, and as in all hierarchical structures, decisions from the top reflect the interests of power-wielding elites. Anyone who has waited in line at Whitmore can bear witness to the lack of flexibility inherent in this style of organization.

There is a dire absence of personal attention that is sometimes necessary for the proper handling of students' individual situations. Participants in this institution are compartmentalized and numbered contradictory to the wide-ranging and unpredictable diversity of human experiences.

A certain understanding of social and personal crises that is especially necessary at a University is lost in the array of rigid and impersonal relations that characterize the many departments of our school.

Increasingly prevalent is the ideology of issuing funds on the basis of market forces. Departments whose activities are expected to bring a high marketability are considered worthy of funding. Those that do not fit this model are encouraged to operate with self-sufficiency.

All departments are pressured to attract private investment, to make up for the lack of funds from the state. This may be no difficult task for hard sciences which may have high-tech or biotech firms eager to fund research in these areas. But for the humanities and social sciences funding may not be as readily available.

In addition, those departments which do illicit funds from private sources are then tied to the whims of that source or revenue. This may often be in contradiction not only to the interests of students involved but also to the ideology of public higher education in general. To expect an institution that was designed as a subsidy to operate at optimal self- sufficiency is a recipe for disaster, spelling crowded classrooms, overworked staff and declining quality of service.

The reduction of educational processes to their raw marketability inherent in these types of plans tends to engender a cynicism, or even disdain, for the self-governing capabilities of individuals in a social setting with which they are often far more in tune. Some student operated business and RSOs, indeed even some academic departments, prove this cynicism unwarranted.

Groups like People's Market, Earthfoods, Campus Design and Copy, the Bike Co-op, and the STPEC program, often organized with consensus decision-making, are inherently more flexible in their relations with students, promote and develop responsibility and leadership, and embody the kinds of personal relations that foster a feeling of community absent in most areas of UMass.

Entangled in the interactions of large state and private authoritarian structures, small communities and political organizations struggle for the right to control their own destinies. The organizing and operating of these groups serves to instil a sense of empowerment, responsibility and cooperation that is scarcely available in any other form of social activity.

Students here are slowly but surely engaging in these types of activity and, as this trend persists, will no doubt demand the respect and flexibility from the administration that they deserve. Perhaps a time is not far off when the trend to further dehumanize relations at UMass is halted or even rolled back. There is much to be done, but the first steps have already been taken, and once students taste the power of self-organization they will refuse to be further denied.

Banding together

Fred Hurlbrink Jr.

Alright, so a Booty Schwagg is apparently a bad thing. I guess I'm not hip enough to be down with such terminology. But, when I give the Minuteman marching band that dubious honor, I do it with the best intentions.

This collection of 300 zealous (over-zealous), hard-working, dedicated students has become one of the most respected organizations on campus — at freshman convocation, SGA Prez Maurice Caston introduced them as "the university's most famous ambassadors" — and deserves more than some weakly-termed recognition in the Collegian.

They call themselves the "Power and Class of New England" and have defended that title for close to two decades now. Not only are they the "Power and Class" of the region, they are without a doubt the most exciting, most exhilarating, best band in New England.

They do what they do with a certain flair and panache that has been burgeoned by their equally flamboyant director George N. Parks who is revered as one of the top marching band authorities around. Parks instills a sense of pride in the band's members that transcends all known definitions of the word.

This is a group that has carried the label of Best band in New England for quite a while now, and has believed that it could be the best band in all of the East. Recently, the Minuteman marching band was given a chance to stake their claim to such accolades as they travelled to Allentown, PA to participate in a college band exhibition.

After listening to an aptly-named Billy Joel tune about a thousand times on the lengthy bus trip, the Minutemen of the march busted into Allentown and completely blew the doors off of the other bands at the show including the inimitable Morgan State band, an improving University of Delaware group and Parks' alma mater West Chester, which is also regarded as one of the top bands in the region.

The crowd was equally thrown for a loop. They seemed to spend as much time on their feet as the band did as the fans gave the band numerous standing ovations, including one in the middle of a song.

More impressive than how the other bands and the crowd reacted to the performance was how the UMass delegation reacted to it. Associate director Thomas Hannum — one of the top percussion instructors in the country — said to the band after the 20-minute show that he may have never been part of a better performance.

Both Parks and Assistant director Michael Klesh noted how powerful the performance was and how much the band had exceeded any expectations that had been set.

So, now the Minuteman marching band has ventured outside New England, and they just might stake their claim to being the best marching band in the eastern United States.

How does such an enormous group come together to perform with the intensity and power and unity that the Minuteman marching band displays? To be honest, it baffles the logical mind, but this ensemble works so incredibly hard that if they were sanctioned by the NCAA, Parks would have been fired long ago.

The NCAA regulates weekly practice time, and according to one coach in the athletic department, he is only allowed to work his team for 20 hours a week. Well, during the season, the band sticks to that guideline, rehearsing for about an hour and a half every day, and at least three and a half hours Saturday mornings before a football game.

Then again, a week before the fall semester starts the Minuteman marching band has its annual band camp at which they rehearse for about 15 hours a day or so. So, you math majors out there can figure out how quickly Parks surpasses the 20-hour mark.

Through all this hard work, members don't just become a part of the band (as cliche as it sounds) the band becomes a part of them.

So, next time you're at a football game, and you are one of those wacky people that are actually there to watch the football game rather than the halftime show, stick around for a few minutes and you'll find out why there are never any lines at the hot dog stand after the second quarter.

Who would have ever figured that a true punk icon like Crash would be seen by millions of middle class Americans looking for George F. Will's latest column? Grass Records recently issued Germs (Tribute): A Small Circle of Friends featuring Sonic Youth, Dinosaur Jr., Hole, Firehose and more.

• Speaking of Sonic Youth, look for an upcoming show with Thurston Moore and Rashied Ali in Amherst sponsored by the fine folks who have hosted an ongoing series of avant-garde jazz and rock shows at the Unitarian Meeting House in Amherst. Ali is best known for his drum work with John Coltrane on albums such as Interstellar Space — an amazing collection of just the two jamming.

• Getting back to Amherst, look for some exciting shows at Hampshire College over the next month. In the last week of October, both the Third Sex (labelmates and friends with Team Dresch) and Cub will play separate shows. Cub, once the world's leading cuddle-core outfit has found a new home and sound recently. Their new album, Box of Hair, on Lookout! mixes up their all too adorable roots with an angrier punk side reminiscent of the Muffs best, but overlooked work. Don't worry for all you cute pop kids out there, Cub hasn't lost its charm yet.

• Pop fans brace yourself for the show of the year, or at least November, as Go Sailor brings their top notch girl-pop to Hampshire College. Led by Rose Melberg, formerly of Tiger Trap and currently of the Softies, Go Sailor has near perfected the three minute pop song. After releasing a few seven-inch singles, Lookout! has combined all three singles plus two compilation tracks for a hit laced CD that even makes me want to dance. Look for an interview with Ms. Melberg on these pages in the near future!

• While Go Sailor may represent the best of American girl pop, Sweeden's Cardigans is making waves on both sides of the Atlantic. Their second American CD, First Band on the Moon, features a cover of Black Sabbath's "Iron Man" plus 10 more swingin' tunes. The first single "Lovefool" sounds like a cross between Madonna and Heavenly, a near perfect song and easily the swellest song to be currently found on alternative rock radio. The Cardigans may be a bit too glossy on their latest, but the fun displayed on Life is still present.

• With the Cardigans selling upwards of one million CDs internationally, 1996 could be the year Heavenly breaks out of the pop underground. In the tragic wake of the suicide of drummer Matthew Fletcher, the band has released their third, and final full length Operation Heavenly on K Records. Hopefully Heavenly will follow in the footsteps of labelmates Dub Narcotic, the Crabs (their new album Brainwashed is excellent) and Satisfact all of whom have passed through town this semester.

Madonna becomes a 'Material Mother'

Lisa M. Oliveri

And the latest celebrity gossip is...

• The 'Material Girl' became a 'Material Mom' last night as Madonna gave birth to her first child, the six pound, nine ounce, Lourdes Maria.

• Here's the weekly Antonio and Melanie update. According to the National Enquirer, Antonio wants to keep Melanie and their child, Stella, in Spain, but Melanie wants to return to the United States, and this is causing the happy pair to fight. Hey, Melanie! Can you be any dumber? You just married the sexiest man on the face of the planet, and you're arguing about where to live? Who cares? I'd live in a dumpster if it was with Antonio.

• In Smashing Pumpkins news, ex-band member Jimmy Chamberlain had his court date last week where he was charged with disorderly conduct, and required to go to drug rehabilitation. Chamberlain was fired from the band after he was caught injecting heroin with keyboardist Jonathan Melvoin. Frankly, I don't think Chamberlain did anything wrong. If I had to listen to Billy Corgan's whining voice for more than five minutes, I'd probably want to shoot up too.

• Cheapskate Sharon Stone is obviously marrying fiancee Michel Benasra for one reason: cash. He's a millionaire who just surprised her with a $50,000 diamond engagement ring on a trip to Paris. This will make a nice set with the $400,000 necklace that was lent to her last year for the Oscars that she refused to give back, saying it was a gift.

• In sadder news, singer Tiny Tim collapsed at the recent ukelele festival in Montague, reportedly from a heart attack. He is now resting in a hospital in Greenfield. I guess he was tiptoeing a little too quickly through the tulips.

• In a recent book by Whitney Houston's former bodyguard Kevin Ammons, he claims she is a lesbian, and was involved for years with assistant Robyn Crawford. Houston, of course, is saying that the rumors are false. Well if sleeping with Bobby Brown every night for the past few years didn't turn her to lesbianism, then nothing will!

• Scott Weiland of the grunge band Stone Temple Pilots has just been released from a drug rehab program and has embarked on a six-week American tour. His first performance was at the infamous Viper Room. No — no pressure to use drugs there.

• George Michael hinted that he would surprise the audience at an upcoming "MTV Unpugged" appearance by bringing a few "old friends." According to CyberSleaze, one of the old friends might be pal Elton John who will show up to sing the duet, "Don't Let The Sun Go Down On Me."

• Just a reminder: Bill Pullman will be next week's host on "Saturday Night Live."

COURTESY WARNER BROS.

Madonna gave birth to her first child last night.

• Publishing company Random House is slowly losing their court battle with diva Joan Collins over the second part of her autobiography. According to CyberSleaze, Random House is threatening to publish her manuscript without any editing to publicly humiliate her. Word of advice: Jackie is the "writer." Go back to Dynasty, Joan.

• One of Michael Jackson's former staff members is once again trashing the poor guy, saying that he made her spy, instructed to listen to phone conversations, blah, blah, blah... Sandi Domez is, of course, suing Jackson. Domez, your 15 minutes of fame are over! Leave Jacko alone. Everyone knows he did not molest any children!

And lastly, The National Enquirer reported the most quirky story, about a woman who brought a frozen chicken back to life. According to the Enquirer, Janet Bonney of Harpswell, Maine was rounding up her chickens when she noticed one lying on its back under her porch. As she was preparing it for burial, she noticed it had a faint heartbeat. Bonney quickly performed mouth-to-beak resuscitation and brought the chicken back to life. The Enquirer reports that both woman and bird are quite happy — he gets to live, and she gets an egg a day. Now that's something to cluck about.

He heard the footsteps behind him, the cocking of the ha... the sweaty finger wrapping its way around the trigger. "Give me ... money or I'll blow your brains out," a voice mumbled. He sighed. Not again. Frankly this ATM holdup thing was getting, well, overdone. Not even the threat varied. His roommate last week at the convenience store? Exactly the same line. Or I'll blow your brains out. Right. Why not something new... something like ... or you won't live to see another sunrise. No, too John Wayne. Okay, Okay, what about ... or you'll never get a chance to test-drive that new ... Oh, forget it. He scooped the stack of bills from the ATM withdrawal door and turned, calmly facing the deadly weapon. What was it about bad guys, anyway? Don't they keep up? "Give me the money now," the voice demanded coarsely, the gun rising to a 90 degree angle. No, make that 98 degrees; clearly the guy was nervous. The student smiled faintly. Sure, prolonging it like this was dangerous, but this time he wanted it all. The bright flash. The deafening sound. The tiny steel rocket ship skimming straight toward his heart. His jaw flinched as he watched the bad guy slowly squeeze the trigger... BANG! The student ducked quickly to his left, the flash instantly triggering the whirring ATM retinal-scan freeze mechanism. The bullet screamed to a stop a chest hair before impact, the man who fired it frozen in place like some gigantic ice cube, a puzzled look on his face. The police would arrive any second, haul the bad guy away. The student chuckled. Turned back to retrieve his card. Damn, that's good software.

Coens' films are a must for video rentals

With the recent success of Joel and Ethan Coen's new video release Fargo, I thought we could take a look back at their previous films. The Coen brothers have a deserved reputation for original and off-beat dramas with well written and quirky characters.

BLOOD SIMPLE
with: Francis McDormand, E. Emmet Walsh

Blood Simple was the Coen brothers first feature and although it was not a major commercial success, it still is a intriguing crime thriller. The narrative moves at an extremely slow pace, but is filled with riveting plot twists that will still keep you on the edge of your seat. McDormand portrays the quintessential femme fatale who hires a hit man to kill her husband and steal his money. You're never quite sure who's working for who until the climax, and even then I promise you will be surprised.

RAISING ARIZONA
with: Nicholas Cage, Holly Hunter

The Coens took a drastic turn from Blood Simple for this eccentric comedy about a down on his luck criminal who falls for a beautiful cop and takes her on a rather bizarre crime spree. When the cop, played by Hunter, can't have children, she and Cage decide to steal one and take on a life of crime as they try to provide for their new adopted son. Raising Arizona is a fast paced classic comedy and the Coens most commercially successful film to date.

MILLER'S CROSSING
with: Gabriel Byrne, Albert Finney

Arguably one of the greatest gangster films since The Godfather, Miller's Crossing is a brilliant, disturbing portrait of friendship and loyalty set to a prohibition era backdrop. The film centers around Byrne's character, Tommy, who is the second-in-command of the Irish mob led by Finney. When the affection of the same woman destroys their bond, Tommy decides to work for the rival Italian mob. In order to gain acceptance, he must take the brother of the woman he loves to Miller's Crossing to assassinate him. The brother played by John Turturro convinces Tommy not to do it, and the stage is set for one of the most intense and thought provoking films of recent years.

BARTON FINK
With: John Turturro, John Goodman

Barton Fink is the Coen's clever tribute to Hollywood in the '30s. Turturro plays a young playwright from New York who gets hired by a Hollywood studio to write for the movies. He struggles with the classic battle of not selling out as he attempts to make a film for and about the working man. He attempts to center his script's main character around his strange next-door neighbor played by Goodman. Together the two form a unique friendship which results in one of the most original endings I have ever seen in a movie.

COURTESY PATTI PERRET

Ethan and Joel Coen, uber-directors-in-arms, deliver manic genius.

HUDSUCKER PROXY
with: Tim Robbins, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Paul Newman

This was supposed to be the Coen's big blockbuster hit with a huge cast and big studio backing. It never did very well in the box office but is a wonderful film nonetheless. The Coens co-wrote the script with Evil Dead director Sam Raimi. The story reinvents the creation of the hula-hoop with Newman as the president of the Hudsucker corporation. Newman hires a clerk from the mail room played by Robbins to bail him out of trouble by giving him his new position as C.E.O. With the help of news reporter Liegh, Robbins attempts to get back at the company for exploiting him.

Deftones jump start Pearl St. crowd

By Scott Bernard
Collegian Staff

DEFTONES
Pearl Street
Oct. 11

Halfway through Deftones' show Friday night, lead singer Chino Moreno screamed out, "You [guys] are crazy, you make me tired." All this after Moreno had already thrown himself into the crowd early into the performance.

The packed house grooved and moshed to Deftones reggae and hip-hop influenced metal all night. Several times the bounds between audience and band were breached as the crowd jumped onto the low stage to dive or have their say with the band.

Twice Moreno stage dived into the crowd, still singing the songs he was in the midst of singing, losing both shoes in the process. He asked for a pair of shoes from the crowd, promising recompense and noting, "It's hard to jump around up here barefoot." Even though it was a rough evening, everyone seemed to be enjoying themselves.

The band began with their usual opener, "Root," before giving an intense reading to the hit single "Bored." Next came their signature song, "Seven Words," which was maniacally brutal. Then Moreno threw the mike into the audience to take a request, which turned out to be the pulverizing "Engine #9."

Deftones then chilled everyone out with "Fireal" which began as hard as the rest of the band's songs but ended peacefully, if unnervingly as Moreno slowly whispered, "Everything felt good, everything was right at first..." before soaring above the steadily increasing din of the rest of the song.

To end the show, Deftones performed "Minus Blindfold" which features a riff which is reminiscent of Pantera, as well as Moreno's manic rapping. It was a good way to tie up the show, and a good way to show off the band's oeuvre.

The first opening band, Dissolve, featured a steady diet of pointless atonality and screechy, virtually unlistenable singing. The second band, Doomnation, was better if a bit derivative of Anthrax as well as Rage Against the Machine (more the former than the latter). The band seemed to be straight-edge and politically conscious, but the extremely high volume muddied this message considerably and they came off as being somewhat pretentious.

The Deftones strut their stuff with the latest show at Pearl St.

Do you like to jam all night to bands like Phish and the Dead? How about spreading the good word about some of the grooviest, swaggiest bands in the area, but not imposing any harsh views upon the locals? Come on down to the Collegian and chill with Mike Burke to keep the music alive.

for a while," Emma said. "And, yeah, this summer I was saying to her that we are going to kill you guys, but she has been saying the same thing to me, like, 'This is my senior year, and I am not losing to you.'

"We have been always on the same team, and she was always so much older than me that we would never play against each other, so this is the first time. It's awesome."

An experienced leader and a young scorer

The last two seasons for the Big Green, Jenna has emerged from the shadows, becoming the team's leading scorer and forming a strong forward combination along with fellow senior Melissa McBean. She was awarded the Lucinda Fernald Award last season (team award for leadership, enthusiasm and dedication), and was also a 1995 NSCAA All-Northeast Region selection.

She is already about to surpass her previous career high in points ('95: 11g, 1a, 23pts), as she has heated up the Ivy League this season with two straight Player of the Week nominations and a four goal blasting of Princeton in a 6–1 win on Sept. 28th.

"Their [Kurowski] is great, and ours is on the way to being great," Rudy said. "Her sister is a complete player, and Emma is on the way to being that."

Emma has been concentrating on her work ethic, as that is the key facet concerning the differences between scoring goals in the high school and collegiate game.

A National Coaches Association Of America All-America selection in her senior year, the quicker pace of the game is fine with the will-o'-the-wisp from south central Massachusetts, which also fits in with the contrasting playing styles of each sister. While Jenna seems to be more of a grinding ball striker, Emma is more of a finesse player.

And, that is not the only thing that contrasts between the two sisters, especially when it comes down to a little friendly trash-talking, and their respective opinions on who is/is not better at the game.

"I played with her for two years in high school, and I wished we were closer in age, so we could have played more together," Jenna Kurowski said. "The past few years I have not seen her so much, but she has definitely grown up from that little freshman I used to play with.

"I don't have the trickier moves as Emma, whereas I like to play with my back to the goal. I think I can turn on the goal better than her, and I do have a much better shot."

"I think she is really good with her back to the goal, and she can turn and shoot really well," Emma Kurowski said. "She has a really good shot from the outside, too, and that is kind of how we're different. I would rather dribble in and beat the defenders. It has always been that way, and I like to go one-on-one.

"But I don't know if she has got a better shot, maybe she just can't beat the defenders as well as I can, so that is why she has to shoot from outside."

Sweet temptation

It was more than a temptation for the Kurowski duo to reunite their high school partnership, but as with life, things just do not happen the way you would like them to happen.

"It would have been great for her to come up here to play," Jenna Kurowski said. "By her junior year in high school, my coach would ask me about her game, her goals and her grades. When she had come up to see us play, she was shocked by how good we really were.

"Every year I have been here we have had good games against UMass. We have won, lost and tied, so this will be my rubber match against them. I think we have the best team in my four years here now, and our offense is really beginning to get going."

In the end, it came down to the decision between Michigan or UMass for the younger Kurowski, and she chose the spacious confines of the Pioneer Valley for both personal and competitive reasons.

"I came here because it was close, and all my relatives like to watch me play," Emma Kurowski said. "Also, the tradition of women's soccer here at UMass, and how well they have done in the past. I liked that a lot, especially compared to Michigan, which was a new program."

"The coach is always telling me that you can never be satisfied with how you're playing, or you will never get better."

In the end, though, the most experienced observer of the Kurowski sisters is not Rudy, or Dartmouth coach Steve Swanson, but the matriarch of the family, their mother Sharon.

She has seen the siblings grow up and mature with each other, along with their brother Adam, and been present every step of the way for both of them, as both people and players.

"Jenna started out at around four or five years old, and Emma would come down with me to the field and watch her play," Sharon Kurowski said. "It was fun watching them play together in high school, but this is the first time they will play against each other in a real game. I'm glad they both play forward, because I would hate to see them defend against each other.

"It'll be a nice contest, and both players and teams are having great years, so it will be great to watch the whole game, and watch them both play."

Minutewoman Notes: UMass is coming off of a short roadtrip to Dayton, Ohio, as they faced off with the Raiders of Wright State last Saturday afternoon. The opposition for this trip was minimal, and the only raiding done was by the Minutewomen, as they defeated the now 6–8 home team by a 2-0 score. UMass was led by their freshmen forwards, Kurcwski and Kate Webb, as the tandem has begun to get the feel for the back of the net in each players inaugural seasons.

Both scored in Saturday's contest, with Kurcwski picking up an assist with sophomore Robin Smith on Webb's third goal of the season. This win was just a win, though, due to the fact it was not an A-10 or Northeast Regional match. The team is still trying to find a groove after the season- ending injury of senior midfielder Rebecca Myers, which is as big of a setback as the team could stand at this point in the season.

Junior keeper Danielle Dion has recaptured the second spot in national goalkeeping, as her 0.38 GAA ranks right behind Maryland's Missy Price (0.28), and holds the top spot in the Northeast Region (0.35).

Internal Combustion Productions (ICP) hosts Cameron's Way farewell show with the Lilys opening up. The Lilys' new album Better Can't Make Your Life Better finds the band parting from their shoegazer roots and brushing off their Kinks influences. After years experimenting with new sounds, leader Kurt Heasley finally seems to have found his niche on this album released by Ché.

• On the subject of Ché, don't miss out on the fabulous new album by Yatsura (formerly Cresel Yatsura). With acts like the Lilys, Yatsura, Slipstream and Magic Hour, Ché has firmly established themselves as one of England's premier independent labels alongside Slampt and Damaged Goods.

Yatsura's debut album We Are Yatsura collects older material as well as new brand new songs. The band has been strongly influenced by American noise acts like Sonic Youth ("Pow R Ball" rivals any of Blonde Redhead's tributes to SY) but also is strongly rooted in pure pop. Although the band's sound is more familiar than innovative, the band mixes noise and pop so well. We Are Yatsura may be one of the best debut albums this year. Yatsura plays their first American gig ever opening for the Wedding Present on Nov. 29 at the Middle East in Cambridge.

• In other British news Stereolab is keeping mighty busy. Next week the band begins another tour of the States, experimental rockers Ui open up. Unfortunately the band is not playing any shows in New England, a date is set for New York City. The two bands are set to release a joint collaboration on 12" on Duophonic.

Stereolab fans must check out the new CD, Red Hot & Rio, a tribute album to Brazilian pop legend Antonio Carlos Jobim. The band joins forces with Herbie Mann, perhaps the most influential flutist in recent jazz history. Together, Mann and Stereolab brilliantly take on "One Note Samba" and "Surfboard." If this wasn't enough reason to buy the album, Crystal Waters does a fantastic cover of "The Boy From Ipanema," while Everything But the Girl brightens up "Corcovado." These two songs may well just give you a bit of hope in the Top 40 music world.

If you need more Stereolab, the band recently released a super limited edition split seven-inch with Fuxa on the British label Lissy's. Also the Lab's collaboration with Nurse With Wound has been rereleased on 12" vinyl – limited edition of 500.

And on a final Stereolab note, run on down to Newbury Comics where they have Transient Random-Noise Bursts With Announcements and Mars Audiac Quintet on sale for just $7.99. You can't beat that. Eddie Vedder will probably agree — Pearl Jam has been covering a Stereolab song in recent concerts. Now that's scary!

Women's XC takes 3rd

By Corey Goodman
Collegian Staff

As their season wears on, the Massachusetts women's cross country team continues to get better and better. After an impressive third-place finish at the Meet of Champions two weeks ago in the Bronx, the Minutewomen returned to action Saturday fresh off a well-deserved bye week.

The time off made all the difference, mentally as well as physically, as UMass clearly ran their best race of the season, pulling off a third-place finish at the Paul Short Invitational in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania.

The Lady Lions of Penn State (51 points) finished the meet in first-place ahead of the overwhelming favorite No. 5 Georgetown (76 points).

The Lady Hoyas ran their second squad, who couldn't quite keep up with the first-string of No. 7 Penn State.

The Minutewomen (165 points) followed up in third-place, running hard to finish ahead of a tough Lafayette team (203 points).

"Everyone had their best times of the season," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "I saw huge improvements from all of the girls."

Rebecca Donaghue ran her best race of the year, finishing fourth overall, with an unbelievable time of 17:38 averaging an impressive, season-high 5:41 per mile.

UMass' supporting cast played a large role in the team's success.

Katie Greenia, from Morrisville, Vt., has assumed the role of the unsung hero with her stretch of strong performances this season. Greenia crossed the line at 18:31 in 21st place Saturday.

Christy Martin's showing (23rd, 18:31) was also good news to LaFreniere.

"This is the first time she's finished under 19 minutes," LaFreniere said. "I was very proud of her."

Rounding out the Minutewomen's top five finishers, was Molly Dunlap and Sharon Tillotson who finished in 56th and 61st, with times of 18:58 and 19:02 respectively.

"The key to the race was that [numbers] 2,3,4 and 5 all nearly finished within 30 seconds of one another," LaFreniere said. "If we continue to get performances like that, we'll be very successful."

LaFreniere feels that this team surge couldn't come at a better time.

"We've reached a point of the season when we must buckle down, and tighten up mentally," LaFreniere said. "I saw signs of this on Saturday."

The road does not get any easier for the Minutewomen next week, when they head out to Boston's Franklin Park to compete in the New England Championships Friday afternoon. If you thought last week's field that included Georgetown and Penn State was tough, watch out for next week's action including the top-ranked Lady Friars of Providence College, and top 10 schools BC and Dartmouth.

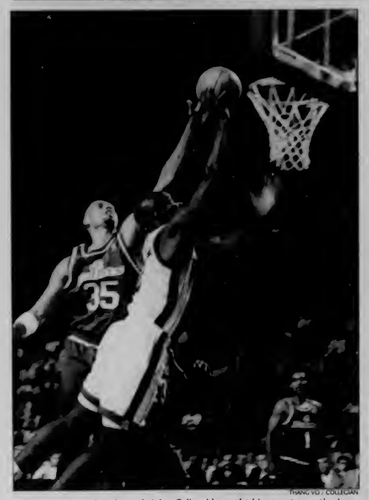
back Frank Alessio, who gained only 10 yards on eight carries, did his damage catching the football. With 8:35 left in the third quarter, Alessio took a Smith pass near the line of scrimmage, and with a vintage Alessio run, scampered 43 yards for a touchdown, putting UMass up 30–6. Wide receiver Doug Clark, who plays baseball for Coach Mike Stone in the spring, looked like an outfielder with 1:31 left in the third, when he patiently waited for a Smith spiral to land, snagging a 33-yard touchdown and staking the Minutemen to a 36–6 lead.

UMass spent the majority of the fourth quarter on the ground. The highlight of the final frame was a 21-yard touchdown run by mammoth freshman fullback Jaime Holston, his second touchdown in only 12 carries so far this year. Deposed starting quarterback Anthony Catterton played most of the fourth, rushing for 21 yards on three carries.

When all was said and done, the Terriers had suffered their fifth straight defeat of over 30 points, and BU head coach Tom Masella did little to conceal his frustration.

"We gave away a football game today," Masella said. "Coming in, we thought that this might be a game we had a chance to win. We didn't execute in the first half. I'm deeply disappointed in the whole team, and I'm deeply disappointed in myself and the whole coaching staff."



The only real highlight for the Terriers came with 8:02 left in the first half, when running back Tom Dreker found a seam in the UMass front line and exploded, sprinting 94 yards for a touchdown. It was not only the longest run in BU history, but it was the longest run a UMass team had given up since 1964.

Though the win was the Minutemen's biggest margin of victory in Yankee Conference play since 1990, when UMass beat BU 47–16, head coach Mike Hodges downplayed the win, and was quick to point out some Minuteman mistakes.

"We got a little lucky playing a young team," Hodges said. "We were very fortunate today. Offensively we struggled for a while, but we played very well defensively."

Jeff Smith, in his second collegiate start, had more success Saturday than he did last week in Rhode Island, when he threw for 74 yards in the Minutemen's 41–21 loss. Smith threw 11 passes in three quarters of work, completing six for in his most impressive game to date. He was helped by good protection all afternoon, as the Terriers were unable to register any sacks on the day.

The game put a damper on Friday's action, as UMass stormed to a 3–2 victory over the Dayton Flyers.

The Minutemen took the field, joyous to finally be playing at home after an extensive road trip.

Senior Dave Siljanovski put the Minutemen on the board first, scoring an unassisted goal at 24:17. He rifled home a loose ball from 17 yards out. The goal moves Siljanovski into sole possession of fifth place on the UMass career goal scoring list, with 29 tallies.

The score would remain 1–0 as the second half commenced.

Dayton knotted the score at 1–1, 51:17 into the game. Flyer forward, Matt Williams, headed a ball from eight yards out, slipping it past Jablonski, in the Minutemen net.

UMass would counter with a rally late into the second half, scoring twice within ten minutes.

Butler would put the team back into the lead as he one– touched a nice feed from sophomore midfielder Scott Regina at 77:38.

Butler would assist Rob Cairo six minutes later to put the Minutemen up, 3–1.

Cairo's goal was his first in a Minuteman uniform and it would prove to be the game winner.

Dayton tacked on a goal with 20 seconds to play, but it was not enough as the Minutemen emerged victorious.

After the game, Cairo deflected any mention that he was the hero of the game.

"It was a total team effort," he related. "We're just worrying about playing our game. If we play well, we feel we can beat anybody."

contracts," Calipari said.

Bright also talked about working with his old coach.

"It's no different," Bright said. "I got an edge on the other guys, they don't know [Calipari] and I do."

Shawn Bradley led all scorers, contributing 15 points. Tony Masenburg and Kendall Gill were also in double figures for New Jersey, scoring 11 and 12 points respectively.

Four players finished in double figures for the Bullets: Rod Strickland and Chris Whitney had 10 apiece, Matt Fish scored 11 and Calbert Cheaney was the team's high scorer with 12.

The Bullets played without three of their most notable players. Juwan Howard, Chris Webber and Gheorghe Muresan did not make the trip to Amherst. The Nets played without Jayson Williams, who made the trip but did not dress because of blisters.

Notes: Former Minuteman assistant coach Ed Schilling, who is now an assistant with the Nets, also made his return to the Mullins Center.

Women's volleyball splits Ohio games

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team played two Ohio teams this past weekend that were mediocre last season — and only one of them still is.

The Minutewomen, coached by Bonnie Kenny, breezed through Cincinnati on Friday by downing Xavier, 16–14, 15– 7, 15–6 before travelling a few miles away the next day to fall to the new powerhouse of the Atlantic 10 conference, Dayton, in five games, 17–15, 4–15, 9–15, 15–8, 9–15, .

The Minutewomen (16–5, 5–3 A–10) were led by Sunderland native Michelle Paciorek, a middle blocker, who posted a career–high 24 kills in only three games of play while hitting .500. It was the seventh A–10 matchup of the season for UMass.

Senior Dionne Nash earned a career–high 26 digs while adding 18 kills to the effort. Freshman Jill Meyers remained consistent, managing 12 kills, while sophomore setter Katie Pearce walked away with 59 assists.

"We played really well against Xavier," said Pearce. "Everyone hit the ball and served well."

The Musketeers were led by Sally Schulte, who notched 20 kills and 15 digs, but only hit .205. Jenny Janszen posted 15 kills and 13 digs, while hitting an impressive .414.

The win marked the 15th time this season that UMass has swept its opponent in three games.

It was a different story against Dayton, however, which was led by two members of the Chinese national team — Zhaohui Ma (31 kills, 22 digs. 25 years old) and Ou Huang (17 kills, 13 digs).

Sheila Kreim also helped out the home team, earning 13 kills and 10 digs, while Lee Anne Bohne and Karen Maciaga added 13 and 12 digs, respectively.

Dayton (17–3, 8–1 A–10), now second place in the A–10, had trouble containing Nash, the senior outside hitter, who led her team with 20 kills and tied her career–high with 26 digs. Junior outside hitter Lesley Nolan and Meyers both contributed 16 kills, while Paciorek added 10 kills and six block assists.

The Minutewomen lost despite jumping out to a 1–0 lead. as the Flyers took games two and three.

"I know we lost but I'm happy with the way we played overall," said Pearce, who finished with 62 assists. "The two women from the Chinese national team were really good, especially [Ma]. But we played hard, although we made some mistakes that we shouldn't have."

UMass which went 3–2 on its five–match road trip, finally returns home to Curry Hicks Cage on Friday to play a couple A–10 rivals. It will be George Washington at 7 p.m. on Friday, and Virginia Tech on Saturday at 7 p.m.

Pearce and company are hardly discouraged after giving the talented Flyers a run for their money.

"We'll beat them next time," she said.

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Joenal Castma continues to be a consistent scoring threat, but the Minutemen could only win one of two this weekend.

Terrier goalie Noreen Flanagan in a penalty stroke situation, but Flanagan stopped the shot.

With 31 seconds remaining in the game, Saskia Fuchs was alone at the top of the circle, but she sent her shot high above the BU net.

The lone Terrier goal came off a penalty corner with 8:06 remaining in the contest. Leonie Kortenhorst took the feed from Michele Barnard on the side of the circle and sent the ball past UMass goalie Hilary Rose.

"I thought we had a great first half," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "We created a lot of scoring opportunities, we had a ton of corners, we really didn't give them anything.

"I think the game was pretty even up until they got a goal. When they scored we really lost our composure."

Rose recorded five saves on the day, while BU's Flanagan made 10.

On Saturday against the Orangewomen, UMass again controlled play, but had trouble finding the back of the net. In the second half alone, UMass was awarded nine corners while Syracuse had only three.

The Orangewomen broke the scoreless tie with 13:27 remaining in regulation when Carolyn Tassini knocked the ball into the UMass cage. The ball appeared to be going out of bounds, but Tassini chased it down to beat Rose.

"We didn't play poorly," Hixon said. "Just a miscue and Syracuse ran it down. It was just one of those days where the ball just didn't fall in the net."

Saturday's physical contest was plagued by late calls from both umpires which led to frustration on the UMass bench.

"We don't usually react to the umpires," Hixon said. "The biggest thing is that we all got caught up in the officiating today, and mentally that really took the edge off our game.

"[The late calls] contribute to the physicalness, because you think you have to push and shove to get the call."

Rose stopped three Syracuse shots, while Orangewoman goalie Aimee Stokes made seven saves.

While she wasn't happy with the weekend's outcome, Hixon was quick to point out that the games were learning experiences.

"For us, the way to the NCAAs is through our conference," Hixon said. "We have to take all of this as learning to make our game that much better. We don't really focus on the results of any game, we're just focusing on how we play and what we do."

These games mark the end of a five–game homestand for the Minutewomen, who will next play on Thursday at Providence. UMass returns home on Nov. 2 to face St. Joseph's.

Minuteman water polo takes thriller

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

The water polo team won this weekend. The End.

Not quite. The weekend almost didn't end for the three– time defending Eastern Champions as No. 15 Queens College took the Minutemen to three overtime periods before No. 16 UMass could pull out an 18–17 victory.

Before Massachusetts (15–3) grappled with Queens — the squad that knocked UMass from the top seed in last year's Eastern Championship — they utterly destroyed a pair of weak Eastern Water Polo Association foes.

The Minutemen embarrassed Iona, 22–7 and shut out the Fordham Rams, 22–0.

The Minutemen actually had an 8–4 lead at half time of the Queens match, but in following what has become an unfortunate trend, UMass folded in the latter stages of the game.

Queens outscored Massachusetts 5–2 in the fourth quarter to complete its comeback, knotting the score at 14 at the end of regulation.

The Minutemen outscored Queens 4–3 in the overtime periods to come away with a huge moral victory and finish the EWPA north season with a perfect 9–0 mark for the second straight season.

Top–scorers Brian Stahl, J.C. Limardo and freshman standout Rich Slingluff each notched four goals in the contest as the UMass offense was on fire all weekend. Scott Stevens was the other multiple scorer for the Minutemen as he tallied a pair of scores.

Senior co–captain Paul Engin managed nine saves as the Queens offense never let up in their all–out blitz of the UMass net.

The other two matches were relatively uneventful from a competitive standpoint, but the UMass offense and the opposing goal keepers saw plenty of action.

In Massachusetts' 22–7 drubbing of Iona, nine Minutemen found the back of the net, led by Stahl (five goals) who continues on his torrid goal–scoring pace.

UMass sandwiched mediocre second and third quarters with a 6–0 first frame, and a more dominating 8–0 fourth period.

Freshman Richard Huntley split time in the UMass net with Engin recording seven saves in the match while the veteran keeper stopped five Iona attempts.

A trio of first–year bench players made the most of considerable playing time in the contest. Cory Koenemann made the biggest impact scoring four times. Bill Hunter had a hat trick and Ryan Gray notched a pair of goals in the romp.

The Rams were even less competition for the Minutemen as UMass recorded its second–ever shutout. The first came in a 17–0 decision over Williams College in 1988.

UMass, again, had a large contingent in the scoring column as sophomore transfer Jake Howard (four goals) headed a group of 10 Minutemen to tickle the twine in the 22–point victory. Slingluff, Gabriel Marrero and "Tiny Tim" Troupis each netted three goals.

Huntley and Engin again split time between the pipes. Both keepers had four saves in the shutout effort.

UM tennis teams bring home split decision

By Michael J. Nam
Collegian Staff

The long weekend saw the Massachusetts women's tennis team (3–2) fall to Dartmouth 9–0, and the men's team (7–0) defeat Vermont 5–2 both last Friday.

The Minutewomen struggled throughout the match winning only two sets during the entire singles segment.

Aside from No. 1 singles player Ola Gerasimova and No. 3 singles entry Jackie Braunstein who won the two sets between them, the women were thoroughly outplayed.

Marie–Christine Caron, Liz Durant, Caroline Steele and Lana Gorodetskaya, the No.'s 2, 4, 5, and 6 singles, all fell in straight sets in a dominating effort by the Dartmouth women.

Michelle Bray of Dartmouth beat UMass junior Caroline Steele at the No. 5 slot 6–2, 6–1.

UMass did not fare any better in the doubles matches with all three of the teams losing to the overwhelming Dartmouth team.

The sweep occurred when the No. 1 doubles team of Gerasimova and Steele, No. 2 doubles Caron and Noelle Orsini and No. 3 doubles Braunstein and Gorodetskaya lost 8–5, 8–5 and 8–6 respectively.

Gerasimova, only a freshman, did provide a brighi spot in the loss with a second set victory (6–3) in her singles match debut, but the Minutewomen were otherwise manhandled.

It was the second loss in a row for the women who also lost to Amherst College 5–3 last week.

This marks the first time this season that the women were defeated in consecutive matches.

The Minutewomen are in danger of slipping to the .500 mark this season after a strong 3–0 start. The two quick losses mark a distinct stumbling block for a program that has been dedicated to winning.

UMass was 15–3 last season, and already the women have two losses this season

UMass will be heading to Storrs, Conn. on Thursday to take on the UConn Huskies and try to end the current skid with a match scheduled for 2:00 p.m.

Meanwhile, the Minutemen won at home against Vermont 5–2 with a strong all–around effort during both the singles and doubles matches.

Sophomore Todd Cheney led the way with a No. 1 singles win over Mike Derby of UVM winning in straight sets 6–2, 6–0.

Cheney also teamed with freshman Ruffino Navarro for a No. 1 doubles win, coming away with a 9–7 victory.

The singles matches also featured victories for the Minutemen from the No. 3–5 slots, with Rob Manchester, Navarro and Alex Aller winning their matches with little trouble.

At the No. 5 singles slot, Aller defeated Vermont's Chris Wilson after losing the first set 4–6, and winning the next two sets 6–3, 6–2.

He also teamed with sophomore Jason Blind to beat Josh Hanna and Hayden Aaronson (8–4) both of whom had strong singles matches.

Hanna won the No. 2 singles match over Jason Blind in a lengthy match that featured four sets. Hanna won 7–5, 5–7, 7–5, 7–6.

Rob Manchester and Mike Skeels were beaten by Myles Webster and Peter Lee of Vermont in the only doubles loss by a score of 8–5.

Skeels also lost in straight sets to Webster 6–0, 6–2 during the singles round to record the second of the two UMass singles losses.

With the victory, the Minutemen remain undefeated improving to a 7–0 record this season.

They will return to action on Thursday rounding out their fall schedule. UMass will play Boston College at Chestnut Hill in a match slated for 3:00 p.m.

the victory that was supposed to be.

While the crowd noise from the annual Band Day crowd was more noise than BU was accustomed to hearing from their fans all year, they actually had a chance to be in this ball game as they continued to go in search of their first win of the campaign.

The Minutemen continued to give chances to the opponents on Saturday as they gave away the ball three times in the first half, two on fumbles and one on an interception. Despite that, they retained a 10–6 advantage with time winding down in the half as BU attempted a field goal. It was blocked and returned for a touchdown by Leggie Beckford of the Minutemen.

Then, instead of the Terriers being content with going into the locker rooms being down 16–6, after they blocked the PAT they decided to run a play from deep in their own territory with less than a minute to go. They fumbled and UMass went on to score to take a 23–6 halftime advantage.

"We gave away a football game here today," BU head coach Tom Masella said. "I thought this was a game we had a chance to be in and win, and we fell apart with about two or three minutes left in the first half and that was it."

The score indicates a blowout, but the performance of the Minutemen at times didn't show it. BU was just unable to capitalize on the five turnovers that UMass committed throughout the game. In addition, the Minutemen were penalized seven times for 60 yards.

"We're obviously very fortunate, we played very well defensively," UMass head coach Mike Hodges said. "Anytime you turn the ball over three times in the half and lead in the football game 23–6 at halftime you've got to feel very fortunate."

"We played very well defensively, and offensively we struggled for a while, but in the second half we went out with some determination that we were going to change things, and we did, we played very well in the second half."

The Minutemen can definitely, however, take out a lot of positives from this game as well: they did come up with a 31 point victory, and it would be tough not to find many things that they did well in order to win by such a margin.

Minuteman fullback Ron Brockington came back strong after a couple of weeks with a slight injury to rush for 92 yards on just 13 carries (7.1 yards/carry).

"I think the offensive line did a great job blocking and [we] have to take what the defense gives us," Brockington said. "They didn't want to give [our running backs] the outside so we had to go between tackles and the O–line did a great job blocking once again and it worked out for the best."

Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith making his second career start, looked a lot more adept, once again scrambling well, rushing for 67 yards on the day on 13 carries. He also threw for two touchdowns while completing six passes for 150 yards.

"I felt comfortable, and I'm glad my offense was behind me," Smith said. "The offensive line did an outstanding job today, and all credit in this game goes to the defense. I put them in a bad situation three different times in the first half, and they played like a bunch of All–Americans. They came through and they won this game for us."

Defense has definitely been the key for the Minutemen all year long as they always seem to come up big with some key stops, and on Saturday the trend continued. UMass held BU to a 25 percent conversion rate on third downs and 0– for–3 on fourth down.

The Terriers fumbled four times, losing three of them and had one ball intercepted.

Freshman cornerback Jerard White came away with the pick; Leggie Beckford blocked a field goal; and linebacker Khari Samuel was big with forcing fumbles while leading the team with seven tackles.

BU's quarterback Jason Barnett would be brought down for a sack three times on the day as he was introduced to Minuteman senior linebacker Mike Dawson, sophomore defensive end Joe Abasciano, and redshirt freshman Chris Price.

Once again, it was a total team effort by the Minutemen, and that can be something that UMass is able to take out of every game this season, win or loss, that at least everyone is playing together with the same passion and desire for the game.

The offensive line was stellar, and they didn't let the BU defenders sack Smith once. They paved the way for the running game as well as the Minutemen outrushed the Terriers 267 yards to 180.

"We made some plays and obviously they made some mistakes to help us," Hodges said. "It just snow–balled on them right before the half. Whatever we did worked and whatever they did didn't. I remember about five weeks ago where that same thing happened the other way around. It's a lot more fun to be on this sideline; I'll tell you that."

Thomas Dicker was the only excitement the Terriers had on the afternoon as he rushed for 150 yards on only nine carries, including a 94–yard touchdown run on a draw play, the longest in BU history and longest given up by UMass since 1964. Barnett, the hard–luck Terrier field general, was only 13–for–36 on the day with 132 aerial yards.

Along with the positives, the negatives still lurk and are plaguing the Minutemen. The turnovers and penalties are something that will most definitely have to be cleaned up before next week and beyond, as the schedule starts to get into the more tougher teams of the conference.

"Obviously we have some very good football teams ahead of us," Hodges said. "We need to continue to improve, and we had far too many mistakes today to get it done against a more experienced football team, and we got to get those things cleaned up."

With the victory, UMass goes to 4–2 on the year and 3–1 in the Yankee Conference as it rides atop the New England division. The Minutemen will get set to take on non–conference opponent Buffalo next Saturday at home, before finishing the year with four conference opponents.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20
If the pace seems hectic, take heart—it should slow down in the near future. Creative thinking will also help ease the stress. You may be able to find a shorter path from point to point.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
Gossiping this week has an unintended effect, so it may be wiser to refrain. A poor opinion someone has already formed about you will become set in stone this week if you're not careful.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
It's a good time to take matters into your own hands and get things settled—you'll be more satisfied when the decision is made, whatever it is. Manage money carefully, because a big purchase could be in the offing.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
Although taking a vacation this week would be wonderful, it may not be the responsible thing to do. Refresh yourself with a few small indulgences, like a hot bath, and then plan a real trip for a more convenient time.

LEO
July 23–August 23
A provocative encounter keeps you guessing as the week progresses. Subtle hints could further your cause—just be sure that outsiders aren't watching, or you may attract more than your share of attention.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22
A powerful person's act of compassion is food for thought, both for you and a close friend. Take it to heart, because you may have an opportunity to make someone else's life easier in the near future.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
Maintaining a good frame of mind may take up much of your energy. It may be wiser to let tempers flare and die of their own accord, rather than trying to keep the seas calm by force.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
Someone close to you may have an attitude problem. If so, try to stay out of their way. It's not in your best interest to try to improve their mood, since they may take it out on you in a very unpleasant way.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
The energetic approach yields great results this week and keeps you feeling great. A peaceful weekend with a dear companion is advisable as a way to maintain your good mood and productivity.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
Maintaining your self-respect this week may be difficult, with pressure coming from a dozen different directions. Try to keep your equanimity intact, and don't sell yourself short—you can do it.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

Then Gabe said, "He should've stayed home in bed.

Minutewomen set for big game

Kurowski sisters battle as UM faces Dartmouth

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Today at 3:30 pm on Richard F. Garber Field, the No. 8 Massachusetts women's soccer team (10–0–1, 4–0–1 in Atlantic 10) will be facing off against Dartmouth (6–2–0, 3–0 in the Ivy League) in a long–standing regional matchup. Both teams are ranked in the top five in the Northeast Region, and this contest will certainly be a benchmark for how well each squad faces the remainder of their respective regular and post–season schedules.

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, this potential opportunity to make a great win happen comes at the most important time of the season. The battle for the last Regional qualifying spot for the NCAAs will be between No. 2 Harvard and No. 3 UMass, as it appears that UConn has a lock on the top spot, so the time for the Minutewomen is now.

"This is the most important game of the year," Rudy said. "The constraints of our A–10 schedule does not give us a chance to play as much of our regional schedule, and we do not even play Harvard anymore.

"So, what is left of our Northeast schedule, we have to make the most of it. To me, this is a playoff game."

The Story behind the Story

What will also be a benchmark this afternoon will be a certain story within a story, as each team's leading scorers have a score to be settled between each other. The Minutewomen's freshman forward Emma Kurowski (7 goals, 4 assists, 18 points) will be making her first ever start against her older sister, and Dartmouth's senior forward, Jenna Kurowski (10g, 3a, 23pts).

Both players had stunning high school careers at Sutton High School, as Jenna helped lead the team to two state championships, scoring over a 100 goals in her career; while Emma led Sutton to four straight state championships, and is now the school's all–time leading scorer.

When it comes down to basics, the two sisters have nothing but love for each other, but when the whistle sounds to start today's contest, all of that will be left behind on the family dinner table. This matchup between the two Northeast powerhouses, and between the two siblings, can now officially be considered a rivalry.

"I definitely think so, especially since her choice of UMass," Jenna Kurowski said. "Our relatives, townspeople and most of all, Emma, have been talking about this game since summertime, even before she was definitely on the team. I have been hearing about Oct. 15th over and over and over."

"Well, I knew as soon as I decided to go to UMass that we would be playing against each other, and I have been kind of excited about it

UMass unleashes offense

Massachusetts returned to its winning ways Saturday, as two touchdowns in the final 61 seconds of the first half broke open a close contest and propelled the Minutemen to a 43–12 pummeling of the hapless Boston University Terriers (0–6, 0–5 Yankee Conference).

Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith threw for 150 yards and two touchdowns, and senior fullback Ron Brockington rushed for 92 yards as the Minutemen improved to 4–2 on the year, and 3–1 in the Yankee Conference.

After a sloppy opening 29 minutes of play that saw seven turnovers (three by UMass) the Minutemen held a 10–6 lead, thanks to a 35–yard Matt Murphy field goal and a 30–yard interception return for a touchdown by redshirt freshman Jerard White. With just over a minute left in the half, BU set up for a field goal attempt that, if successful, would have cut the lead to 10–9. But, UMass senior cornerback Leggie Beckford burst through a hole in the porous Terrier line and blocked the attempt. Beckford picked up the ensuing fumble and scampered 77 yards for the touchdown to give the Minutemen a 17–6 lead.

"I got a great block by Khari Samuel," said Beckford of the runback. "It came around, and I just picked it up and scored."

Massachusetts would seal the game just 18 seconds later, with some help from a familiar source. Samuel, a sophomore linebacker, forced a fumble on the Terriers first play from scrimmage after the blocked field goal attempt, and senior linebacker Justin Reimer scooped up the loose pigskin and ran it back 18 yards, down to the Terrier's 2– yard line. Tailback Matt Jordan plunged into the end zone on the next play, and the Minutemen took a 17–point lead into the locker room.

Bruiser era begins after Calipari says farewell

Bright, Calipari return to UMass

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

It's official. BruiserBall has begun.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team officially opened the 1996–97 season last night during Midnight Madness at the William D. Mullins Center.

James "Bruiser" Flint was introduced to the University as the new Minuteman coach for the first time. Flint received a standing ovation as he followed his team onto the Mullins Center court.

"For Midnight Madness, I just follow the script," Flint said. "Tomorrow it'll be a little bit different. But I've been waiting for this for a long time."

ESPN's Mike Tirico emceed the whole production, which included player introductions, a slam dunk contest, a three– point contest and an intra–squad scrimmage.

Seniors Tyrone Weeks, Carmelo Travieso and Edgar Padilla were the last to emerge from the smoke covered runway and into the near capacity Mullins Center.

While the Minuteman line–up looks different on paper, the team has kept its trademark pre–game bounce. The intros culminated in a circle of bouncing Minutemen, which became synonymous with the UMass program last year.

"[Being a senior] is an incentive to keep working hard," Travieso said. "This will be the last time you get a chance to wear the uniform and represent your school. This is the last Midnight Madness, the last preseason run."

Last night marked the first time the Minuteman freshman class took the floor. Mike Babul, Ajmal Basit, Chris Kirkland, Monty Mack and Winston Smith received a warm welcome to start their UMass careers.

The rookies impressed the crowd immediately, by sweeping both the NBA style three–point and slam dunk contests.

Monty Mack took home the honors in the three–point shootout with 16 points, edging out sophomore Charlton Clarke who tallied 14. Babul had the top score in the dunk contest, as his 360–jam garnered a 9.3.

After the skills competitions, the Minutemen broke into two groups for an intra–squad scrimmage. Padilla and Travieso led the white team to a 36–34 victory over the maroon squad.

Before the team was introduced, a former UMass player was re–introduced to the UMass faithful. Derek Kellogg, a former Minuteman point guard, joins the WHMP broadcasting team, replacing Tony Barbee, who is now an assistant under Flint.

The UMass women's basketball team was also recognized before midnight. After last season's record breaking 20–win performance and first NCAA Tournament appearance, the Minutewomen were presented to the crowd.

The Hoops Band, UMass Cheerleaders, Funk Club and Dance Team all entertained the crowd before the clock struck midnight.

In front of a relatively unenthusiastic crowd of just over 3,400, John Calipari returned to the University of Massachusetts Sunday night as the New Jersey Nets faced the Washington Bullets in NBA preseason exhibition action at the William D. Mullins Center.

The two teams played nearly everyone available to them before the Nets pulled away to secure a 93–80 win.

The fans rose to their feet in a standing ovation when Calipari was introduced, but perhaps the biggest cheer of the night went to former UMass forward Donta Bright, who is working toward a spot on the Nets' regular–season roster.

Bright started the game after receiving his own ovation during the starting line–up announcements. He finished with eight points in 20 minutes of action, shooting 3–for–7 from the floor including a three–pointer. Bright was also 1–for–2 from the free throw line.

Bright said his focus has been on making the team rather than coming back to UMass.

"I'm just going out and playing hard and trying to make the ball club," Bright said.

Bright would not comment on his chances of making the regular–season roster, but current teammate Vincent Askew was quick to comment.

"Very good," Askew said. "His chances are very good."

Calipari would not offer a definite answer on Bright's chances.

"It's going to be hard, but it's hard when you have a lot of guaranteed

Men's soccer split two, let opportunity slip away

By Chris Krein

The end result does not always reveal the content of the game.

This was the case for the Massachusetts men's soccer team as they split their games with Xavier and Dayton this weekend at Richard F. Garber field.

Massachusetts	3
Dayton	2

UMass played swarming, aggressive offense and tenacious defense, utterly dominating the two games. Unfortunately, this manner of play translated to only one notch in the win column, coupled with one heartbreaking loss. The team's record now stands at 7–4–1 on the season, 4–2–0 in Atlantic 10 play.

The team entered play on Sunday, hot off a big 3–2 win over Atlantic 10 co–leader, Dayton. The team played with the same intensity and enthusiasm that led them to victory Friday, but were unable to walk off the field victorious against the Xavier Musketeers.

The Minutemen opened the game with a furious attack on the Musketeer's net, culminating on an amazing unassisted goal by Mike Butler.

Butler scored 1:04 into the contest gathering a rebound off the Xavier keeper, Chris Wright. Butler put it away from five yards out, as he wheeled and kicked it home for the early score.

The Minutemen would control play for the remainder of the half, outshooting their opponent 13–1. They had ample opportunity, but the ball did not find the back of the net. There were plenty of near misses that went tight to the sides, as well as some key saves by the Xavier netminder.

The second half would see the same style of play, but all the breaks seemed to go Xavier's way.

Maringo Vlijter tied the score at 1–1 when he was fouled in the penalty box. He converted the penalty kick in the 63rd minute, driving the ball into the back of the net past UMass keeper, Jeff Jablonski.

With 21:55 left to play, an almost identical play occurred in Xavier's box, when UMass sophomore Marc Saad was taken down while he was attempting to shoot. However, the referee either missed the play, or did not think it was a foul. This questionable call was the beginning for a frustrating final 20 minutes for the Minutemen.

Eventually, even the chance for overtime was dashed when Vlijter capitalized on a rare Xavier opportunity.

He slid a pass to Musketeer forward Mike Crosby, who put in a shot to the right of Jablonski. Xavier went up for good at 2–1.

Undaunted, the Minutemen would continue to swarm the goal until the last play of the game.

Junior midfielder, Tashi Tshering, fired a bullet from 12 yards out, but Wright picked it out of the air as time expired, spoiling hopes for a miraculous comeback.

Senior defender, Joe Jacobson, was incredulous after the game.

"I think we could have finished a little better. We had a lot of opportunities," he said. "Things just don't always go your way."

Koch expressed similar sentiments.

Xavier	2
Massachusetts	1

"We had plenty of shots, but we didn't put it away," he said. "Their goalkeeper had a good game. They did what they had to do."

In goal, Wright made nine saves, while Jablonski tallied three.

The statistics revealed the Minutemen's control as they outshot Xavier, 19–6, and held the advantage in corner kicks, 5–0. Xavier improves on the season to 5–7–0 overall, 2–4–0 in conference play.

"Motor Votor" law increases regstration

WASHINGTON (AP) — Since the "motor voter" law went into effect last year, registration rolls have increased by nine million, a study released Tuesday shows.

That represents 17 percent of the 54 million people who had been unregistered in states covered by the new system, according to the study, prepared for the National Motor Voter Coalition, co-chaired by the League of Women Voters and the NAACP. The report was done by Human Serve, a New York-based nonpartisan registration reform organization.

For the 18 months from January 1995 to June 1996, some 20 million people either registered to vote for the first time, re-registered or updated their registrations using the law.

"It shows that many more people will register if it is made simple," said Frances Privin, Human Serve's co-director.

Some 8.8 million people, or 44.4 percent, registered at a department of motor vehicles, the report said. About 5 million, or 24 percent, registered through the mail. Voters also registered at other government locations such as unemployment offices, libraries or military recruiting offices.

The National Voter Rights Act requires states to offer registration through state agencies such as driver's license offices — hence the name, motor voter.

U.S. says Iraq didn't rebuild missle bases

WASHINGTON (AP) — Iraq rebuilt part of its surface-to-airmissile network in southern Iraq last month within two weeks ofU.S. missile attacks on the system, a senior U.S. military officersays.

"They've been able to rebuild parts of the system," said theofficer, who was interviewed recently and who spoke on condition ofanonymity. "They've been slapping things together but notthreatening our aircraft."

The officer, who said the United States is closely monitoringthe situation, told The Associated Press the rebuilt weapon systemwas patched together and is less sophisticated than the networkbefore the U.S. missile attacks.

Asked about the report today, White House spokesman Mike McCurrysaid the missile sites "have not been rebuilt, quote, unquote, tothe point where they are being used by Saddam Hussein" to threatenU.S. pilots.

The radars of the systems can be switched on to pinpoint alliedaircraft monitoring the no-fly zone in southern Iraq, but that alsomakes them vulnerable to attacks by allied aircraft aimed withradar-seeking missiles.

"It is the same basic (system) that was there the 30th of August 1996," the Washington Post said in today's editions, also quoting an unnamed official.

Last chance to sign up for registration

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association's (SGA) voter registration campaign is in its final day of registration, today.

"We believe that the students are feeling the urgency to get out and register to vote before the deadline," said Jason Vecchio, student coordinator of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

According to Vecchio, the campaign has registered approximately 7,500 students at the University.

"There will be a table in front of the Munchie Store in the Student Union (Building) to register students," Vecchio said.

Vecchio said the registration cards will be collected until 9 p.m. tonight at the SGA offices in the Student Union.

The registration cards will then be taken to the Indian Orchard Branch of the U.S. Post Office in Springfield at 10:30 p.m., said Frank Mozell, voter registration coordinator of the SGA–led campaign.

According to Mozell, the registration cards must be postmarked by the post office by the Oct. 16 registration deadline.

"As an African–American male, I feel that I am living up to my part (of the Million Man March)," Mozell said.

"One of the messages I took from the March was to be involved in the political process," he added.

Mozell urges people of color to register to vote because they "are one of the first groups to feel the effect of political reforms," such as Head Start.

In addition to the SGA effort, MassPIRG has formed a coalition with 20 student organizations to endorse the SGA's voter registration efforts.

The Youth Vote '96 Coalition supporters include the College Democrats, Honors Program, University Productions and Concerts and the UMass Pagan Association — among others.

"(The voter registration) would not be possible without the support of the UMass community as a whole. UMass votes is me, it's you and the student organizations," Mozell said.

Meghan Kiley, a first year english major said, "The biggest thing with the voter registration campaign is awareness.

"We are going to get out and let people know that their vote counts," she added, referring to MassPIRG's campus– wide effort to raise awareness of voting.

She said that it is the duty of every student to vote and voice their opinions.

"I am already registered to vote, but I wanted to get an absentee ballot so I didn't have to go back home to vote," said Nathan Jones, sophomore social thought and political economy major, who was reminded by his parents this past weekend to change his voting address.

Speaker addresses women's vote

ELIZABETH BROWN \ COLLEGIAN

Professor Jane Blankership spoke yesterday night at Memorial Hall about women in electoral process.

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Staff

The Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series sponsored Professor Jane Blankenship in a lecture entitled "The Sites and Sounds of Change: The Discourse of Women in Electoral Politics."

The lecture began with Blankenship orating to the audience her first memories of political involvement. Blankenship described and experience when she was two years old her grandfather let her mark her very first ballot so one day she could say she voted for Franklin Roosevelt.

Later she remembered seeing her mother crying over the sink and wondered what was wrong. Her mother then told her "The President is dead." From this point on Blankenship realized that "there was some sort of connection between the President and people."

Blankenship realized at an early age that there was more to the President than a voice on the radio or pictures on television. "It is through communication that we establish that bond. Communication is a primary feature of being human," said Blankenship.

Blankenship's lecture focused on issues surrounding women and their relationship with politics as compared to the male experience. "Talk of women [in politics] is largely silenced. We live in a world where politics is talked about as if it were a sports event," said Blankenship.

Blankenship cited several examples of how women adjust when they enter into the male dominated sphere of politics. One example is that they have to know how to "talk the talk." Another example cited was how women get caught in double binds. Women have to determine how "to be tough enough to hold office, but not too tough which would risk losing their feminity," said Blankenship.

Geraldine Ferraro was labelled as one of these women who fell into the "double bind" category. Ferraro, labelled by a magazine as "One of the Boys and More," left Blankenship

Fair showcases the various study abroad opportunities for students

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

If the beauty of a Massachusetts' fall has lost its thrill, and the wet spring has become an even more tiresome season, the University of Massachusetts International Program Office (IPO) says it has a solution.

The program will offer a Study Abroad Fair today for students interested in studying in another country.

"Just go and totally emersed yourself," said program peer counsellor Phil Spirito, a senior communications and Spanish major. He studied through a UMass program in Colombia.

"It seems kind of logical to stay away from as much of American culture as you can, and just fend for yourself," he added.

Amy Reede, a senior hotel, restaurant and travel administration major, who studied in England, said that "you keep an open mind and try to absorb as much as you can."

According to peer counsellor David Costa, a senior Spanish major who studied in Spain, the process of choosing a school in another country is relatively easy and straight forward.

There are experienced peer advisors at IPO to help direct students to the appropriate information, or to help them figure out where they would like to study, said Costa. These counsellors are also there to guide the students through the application process.

"At first it seems a bit overwhelming, but it's not that bad," Costa said. "It's pretty easy, actually."

The application process is similar to applying to any university in the United States, said Costas.

Costa also explained that language is not always a problem, as many of the programs offer all of their instruction in English.

The GPA qualifications also vary, with many foreign schools looking at the GPA of a student's major, rather than an overall GPA.

According to Reede, in some cases tuition is equal to what a student would normally pay to attend UMass. Financial aid is always available, he added.

Reede, Spirito and Costa all agree that it was one of the best experiences they have had at UMass.

"It was excellent," said Reede. "I'm definitely glad I went for a year. You get a lot out of it and you get to meet a lot of great friends."

Spirito said: "Any problems you have is worth it [studying abroad]. When you go through a transition, it makes you stronger. You notice the growth and you learn to express yourself better."

IPO, which is normally located in Hills South, will have representatives on the Campus Center Concourse between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m. to help assist students and make foreign exchange information available.

Returning students will also be there to share their experiences and offer advice.

IPO exists to "hold the hand for students who are uncertain of what direction they want to take," Spirito said. However, he said, students should be prepared to do some work for the experience of studying abroad.

"We're trying to reach out a little bit and let people know we're here," Costas said. "We want to let students

Dole's speech attacks Clinton's ethics

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — On the eve of the final presidential debate, Bob Dole issued a scathing indictment of "ethical failures" by President Clinton and his administration in a frontal attack on character issues he had treaded on only gingerly in the past. Previewing a tougher, more-negative stance that he is expected to take to the debate, Dole asserted on yesterday that Clinton was presiding over one of the most unethical administrations in U.S. history.

Clinton dismissed the assault as "just politics."

Dole cited a pattern "of half-truths, an atmosphere of evasion." He rattled off a catalogue of alleged ethical lapses by the administration, beginning with the 1993 firing of White House Travel Office veterans to the current dispute over links to Asian businessmen and their contributions to Democrats.

He also cited the collection of FBI files by the Clinton White House and what he suggested was the president's dangling of pardons before his Whitewater associates.

"The Clinton administration has made our nation more cynical," Dole said.

Furthermore, the Republican challenger asserted that polls showing Clinton's continued comfortable lead suggest "many voters seem ready to support Bill Clinton, even though they believe he is unethical."

"A president who has betrayed your trust has not won your vote. In my view, it is that simple. To say otherwise is to send a message that public integrity is meaningless," Dole said.

The speech, to a nonpartisan high-tech business group, came as Dole campaign strategists played a card that Dole had resisted in the past — an all-out negative attack. It was a high-risk attempt to jar a presidential race that has been frozen in the polls for months.

Dole strategists also hoped the assault, coming just a day before the debate, would heighten public interest and lead to a wider TV audience.

"No administration has been more self-righteous," Dole told the annual conference of the Electronics Industry Association in nearby Coronado. "But few administrations have been more self-serving. No administration has shown more arrogance. But few have displayed more ethical failures."

Dole cited "an integrity gap" in the Clinton administration "between the low standards they have adopted and the high honor that they hold. A gap between their swagger and their public scandals."

Dole was here preparing for tonight's debate, which many advisers see as a last chance for him to break out of the polling doldrums.

With the election just three weeks away, Clinton retains a commanding double-digit lead in national surveys.

Clinton shrugged off yesterday's attacks, sticking with a strategy to portray himself as the candidate who is above personal insults. Speaking to reporters during Dole's remarks, the president was asked if he was concerned about the blistering comments.

"No," he replied. "We're going to have a debate tomorrow night, but I have not only tried to take responsibility for things that I have some responsibility for — good or bad — but also to share some of the good news with the American people."

Clinton also said Americans want a campaign about "issues, ideas and not insults. And the American people can simply make up their own mind."

The candidates' running mates also focused on the ethical theme. From Fort Lauderdale, Fla., Vice President Al Gore said Dole "has no business talking integrity as an issue in the campaign" when he's promoting a "risky" tax cut plan that would balloon the deficit. In Las Vegas, Republican Jack Kemp charged that in the Clinton administration ethics is an "oxymoron."

Traffic saftey goes on

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts department of public safety will be conducting a traffic safety program focusing on crosswalk violations today through Oct. 25.

Police officers will set up checkpoints at key areas on campus to monitor and enforce laws regarding crosswalks.

Deputy Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said the program will deal both with education and enforcement of crosswalk laws.

"It's an effort to educate the public on crosswalk laws," O'Connor said.

According to O'Connor, the police department has heard several pedestrian complaints about dangerous crossing areas on campus.

"Through the last several months, we have received feedback from the University community that crosswalks are really an issue," O'Connor said.

O'Connor said the checkpoints will be held in areas where it has been reportedly difficult to cross the street.

Today's checkpoint will be conducted on Massachusetts Avenue at Presidents Drive from 8:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The same area will be the site of a second checkpoint during the same time period on Oct. 22.

Commonwealth Avenue at the Physical Plant crosswalk will be host to a checkpoint tomorrow from 8:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. and 4 p.m. - 5:30 p.m., and again on Oct. 24 from 4 p.m. - 5:30 p.m.

On Oct. 25, officers will run a checkpoint on University Drive at Fearing Street extension from 8:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m.

This program was initiated by Public Safety based upon the success of the Safe Roads campaign which was conducted last month, O'Connor said. With the Safe Roads project, officers set up checkpoints to educate drivers about the use of seat belts and child safety restraints.

Safe Roads, however, was sponsored by a grant, and the crosswalk safety program is an initiative solely sponsored by the Public Safety Department.

Similar to Safe Roads, the current checkpoint series will involve three days of education and three days of enforcement. The first day drivers will be stopped for violating crosswalk laws and will receive information regarding the law. The second day, drivers will receive citations.

Massachusetts law states that a driver of a vehicle shall yield the right of way to a pedestrian crossing the roadway within a marked crosswalk. Fines of up to $100 may be imposed for violations.

O'Connor said that unlike Safe Roads, this program will only target violators. Drivers who are acting within the crosswalk law will not be stopped.

While the actual checkpoints will have police cruisers and uniformed officers performing the traffic stops, officers in civilian clothing will actually watch for crosswalk violations and call ahead to the officers at the checkpoint.

Ross Perot adds number of rallies as time starts running out in election

By Katie Fairbank
Associated Press

DALLAS — Running out of time to turn around his presidential campaign, Ross Perot is adding a series of rallies to round out a political schedule that is still bare-bones compared to his major-party rivals.

Perot has added to his schedule eight rallies and two speeches at colleges around the country and in cities in Ohio, New York and Florida where the Reform Party has support.

Campaign coordinator Russ Verney said that when Perot's appearances are combined with those by running mate Pat Choate, "we'll be able to cover a good portion of the country before this is over." He said the appearances were designed to reach "voters who are likely to get out and get motivated but otherwise wouldn't be likely to go to the polls."

Perot, who is languishing in the single digits in opinion polls, has done most of his campaigning from TV studios since he accepted the Reform Party nomination on Aug. 18. He has appeared publicly about once a week and held just one rally.

His campaign strategy has been under revision since the Commission on Presidential Debates decided to exclude him from the debates and he encountered difficulty getting desirable network time slots for his TV infomercials.

His new schedule starts with a rally tomorrow at Purdue University in West Lafayette, Ind., but is still light compared to the hectic schedules of President Clinton and Republican Bob Dole. Other planned appearances:

• Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., Pensacola, Fla. and Youngstown, Ohio, Oct. 25;

• Virginia Tech University in Blacksburg, Va., Oct. 28;

• Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 30;

• Buffalo, N.Y., and Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., Oct. 31.

• He also plans to give speeches to the Inland Press Association in Chicago on Oct. 21, and to the World Affairs Council in Los Angeles on Oct. 22. Verney said additional appearances also would be scheduled.

Study shows a decrease in television violence

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — President Clinton showcased a network-financed study yesterday showing a decline in TV violence as part of his homestretch strategy to look presidential and generate positive headlines.

Breaking from debate preparation, the president praised the latest results of a three-year study by the University of California, Los Angeles. Despite shows like "The Mighty Morphin Power Rangers" and "Nash Bridges," gratuitous violence declined in the 1995-96 season, the report says.

"We are moving measurably in the right direction — away from violence and toward more programming for children," Clinton said. "We have a long way to go but we are making progress for our children."

Jeff Cole, director of the UCLA center for Communication Policy and the study's author, flew to New Mexico for the event. "Much more work needs to be done," he said. "But we hope this is a trend."

Cole's appearance gave Clinton a leg up as the presidential campaigns elbowed for advantage on the TV violence issue.

The president and rival Bob Dole have attacked Hollywood for glamorizing sex and violence. Clinton pushed for a ratings system for television programs, more hours of children's programming and "V-chips" for television sets so parents can block shows they consider inappropriate for their children.

"I think we deserve some credit," White House press secretary Mike McCurry said. But he later added, "I would credit Bob Dole as well."

Clinton was less generous: "This project... was well under way before Senator Dole ever said anything."

The White House solicited Cole's appearance to put the president's stamp of approval on a study that speaks to the concerns of many Americans.

"Every parent knows exposure to TV violence can be numbing and send the wrong message to their children," Clinton said.

The UCLA Television Report on the 1995-96 season concluded that Hollywood is doing better at reducing the violence portrayed on primetime series and children's programming, although "there remains room for improvement."

Television's bloodiest moments continue to occur in movies transplanted from theaters.

"The UCLA report should put to rest false claims that network TV violence is raging out of control," said Edward O. Fritts, president of the National Association of Broadcasters. He said he confirms that the broadcasters "are responding to audience concerns."

The $500,000 study is the second of three financed by ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox in response to congressional and consumer complaints about TV violence.

Showcasing the study was Clinton's latest bid to rise above the frenzy of presidential campaigning and look presidential — calm, steady and nonpartisan — while underdog Dole is forced into a risky attack strategy.

On Monday, he signed a bill allowing the sale of surplus military planes to fight forest fires. A day earlier, he denounced rapists while signing a bill to outlaw "date rape drugs," and he highlighted statistics showing a drop in crime rates.

Cole said the TV study tried to look at such things as whether scenes were particularly gory or viewers learned the consequences of the violence depicted.

Of 114 TV series last season, the study found only five used violence frequently in questionable ways — graphically or heroically. That's down from nine cited last year.

By contrast, 29 percent of 113 theatrical films studied raised concerns about violence. Still, that's down from 42 percent the year before.

Suharto speaks in East Timor, defends his rule

By Ali Kotarumalos
Associated Press

DILI, Indonesia — President Suharto defended his rule in East Timor during a visit to the territory yesterday, never once mentioning the bloody, 21-year-old fight to crush its independence movement.

Suharto, in East Timor to inaugurate a giant statue of Jesus Christ as a gesture of religious tolerance, shook hands with Nobel laureate Bishop Carlos Felipe Ximenes Belo, and the two took a helicopter ride together.

Belo said later that they spoke little, and the president said nothing about the prize Belo shared Friday with resistance leader Jose Ramos-Horta. Belo and Ramos-Horta were honored for their opposition to Indonesia's domination of the former Portuguese colony.

Indonesia annexed East Timor in 1976, a year after its invasion during a civil war that ended four centuries of Portuguese rule. As many as 260,000 people died during the next five years from military action, disease or starvation. Human rights groups say Indonesian troops have tortured, beaten and killed civilians in a bid to stifle separatist aspirations.

The president, who ordered the 1975 invasion and has been in power for 30 years, was driven from the airport to the governor's office through Dili streets that security forces had cleared of the typical heavy morning traffic.

In a speech outside the governor's office, Suharto emphasized the government's success in building roads and schools and raising incomes in East Timor, which geographically is closer to Australia than Jakarta, the Indonesian capital.

Suharto struck a drum three times and signed plaques to inaugurate the 56-foot black marble Christ statue, a highway, three bridges and a street named for his wife, Ibu Tien.

"The construction of this statue shows that after East Timor became part of Indonesia, values that are religious and sacred continue to grow and expand," he said.

Ramos-Horta, co-winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, accused Suharto of misusing religion, calling the statue "an affront to the East Timorese people... and a joke in poor taste."

Suharto's visit "is a publicity stunt to signal Indonesian sovereignty of East Timor," Ramos-Horta told reporters in Sydney, Australia, where he lives in exile.

Armed Forces Commander Gen. Feisal Tanjung was the only Indonesian official who mentioned the Nobel Prize during yesterday's visit.

"Congratulations for the award," he told Belo at the inauguration ceremony for the statue, shaking his hand and taking a seat beside him on the stage.

Belo is the most influential figure in East Timor, the only predominantly Catholic region of Indonesia, the world's largest Muslim nation.

In an interview Monday with The Associated Press, he said he hoped the prize would increase pressure on Suharto's government to resolve the conflict. He suggested a referendum on autonomy — something Indonesia has rejected in the past.

Also yesterday, Suharto received the title "Bapak Integrasi," or "Father of Integration" — a reference to Indonesia's annexation of East Timor — from the speaker of the local parliament.

About 200 students protested the title by making a bonfire of local newspapers that carried Suharto's picture. Police broke up the protest outside the University of East Timor.

"It does not come from the heart of the people. It is a choice made by the officials," one protester said.

to wonder "what does it take to be more than one of the boys?" Ferraro came to her own realization of what it meant to be tough enough to compete. "I'm tough, what does tough really mean? It was tough for my mother to work at a garment factory, tough for me to go to night school," said Ferraro.

Continuing with the theme that the female experience in politics were different than that of a man, Blankenship stated "it's not that women are better than men, it's that we are different." To illustrate this point a collection of major themes and findings was distributed from Voices, Views, Votes: The Impact of Women in the 103rd Congress.

Blankenship also spoke briefly about how women have different experiences and therefore can "look out into the world in different ways. Women have a lived experience," said Blankenship, whereas men have never experienced some of these things such as rape.

Blankenship responded to several questions, one from a audience member who asked what college females could do to get involved at a local level. "Get involved– get in the pipeline. Organize grassroots efforts and develop a kind of resume."

At the end of the lecture Chancellor David Scott awarded Blankenship with the Chancellor's Medal for Distinguished Service at the University of Massachusetts.

This event was sponsored by the Chancellor's Office.

My own view

Friday, Oct. 11 was "Coming Out" day for gays, lesbians and bisexuals. I would like to address the issue of homosexuality from my own personal viewpoint as a heterosexual. Unlike some of my former columns, I'm not trying to offend anyone. Instead, I would like to offer a differing opinion than the one we have seen in the Collegian.

First off, I may as well come right out and say it: I do not support homosexuality in any way, shape or form. How can I say this? Because I find it unnatural and somewhat immoral. Does this opinion make me homophobic? I don't believe so. It's not like I hate gays. One of my oldest and closest family friends is as flaming as a raging bonfire. He lived in the same house as my family for quite some time when I was young; he played games with us and baby-sat for us and I have never thought twice about that fact. We still keep in touch, but I simply do not support his lifestyle.

Erik Molitor

For me, I am disgusted by the image of sexual activity between members of the same sex, much like I am repulsed by the image of sexual activity with an unattractive female. I shudder at the thought of either of these scenarios. Such thoughts make me very uncomfortable, but I can certainly have a friendly relationship with a gay man as easily as I could with an unattractive girl.

When I meet with a guy friend that I haven't seen for a while, I think nothing of giving him a hug or patting him on the back. There is definitely a line I will not cross, though. The hug is always brief, and never too close. It simply makes things uncomfortable.

What the heck is my point here? All I am really trying to say is that it is OK to be against homosexuality. Many people feel very strongly on this issue, and will never change their minds. Most religions have taught for centuries that homosexuality is wrong. Although I am not religious, I believe that this is a sin. I also think it is wrong to attempt to change someone's faith in their religious teachings just because it is the politically correct thing to do. Not only is it wrong, it is impossible. Many people realize that sexual pleasure was meant to be an incentive for procreation of the race. It is the most basic law of nature: to survive you must reproduce. Homosexuality goes against the laws of nature.

This sentiment, however, does not give anyone the right to persecute someone else for being gay. The same religions that teach that homosexuality is a sin also teach to hate the sin, not the sinner. You can still be friends with someone, even though you do not support the life they choose to lead. Much in the same manner that I hate pot smoking, I have countless close friends who smoke. I simply get lost when they do so, the same as I would get lost if a friend began to make sexual implications. There have been several times in which Keven (my gay friend) has turned the conversation towards graphic details of his relationships. When this has happened, I excuse myself.

Again, my argument is that it is OK, even encourageable, for people to be offended by different issues. A dynamic world is filled with tension and strife. I would hate to see the day that everyone agrees on everything, because that is the day we have all been assimilated to think, believe and act the same exact way. Don't let society tell you what you should feel. If you think homosexuality is wrong, it is your God given right to hold that conviction.

I can not stress this point enough: this article is absolutely not meant to be a rallying point for unintelligent, homophobic people to gay bash. Who am I to say that homosexuality is wrong in all cases? That is my point— it is not my place to say, but it is also no one else's place to question the personal experiences, faith, and education that have led us each to believe different things.

Erik Molitor is a UMass student.

Letters to the Editor

Who are "God's chosen?"

To the editor:

Matthew Wurtzel raises a set of fascinating questions in "Land for peace not the answer" (Oct. 7). In the context of the debate over the recent killing of scores of unarmed Palestinian civilians by the Israeli army, Wurtzel is reduced to comparing the struggle for Palestinian human rights to the Holocaust, stating that "The election of Netanyahu assures that Jews will not allow themselves to go quietly into the night again, as we did in Europe 50 years ago."

As if such confusion was not bizarre enough, Wurtzel goes on to assert "We have survived the Spanish Inquisition, Russian pogroms and the Holocaust; and we will continue to thrive despite our enemies because we are God's chosen people."

This traditional, but somewhat mysterious assertion, when raised in this context, invites a series of basic questions. What does being oppressed by "God's chosen people" imply for the Palestinians? Is it the will of God that they shouldn't have their land seized, their human and national rights denied, their children shot down in the streets by "God's chosen" soldiers? Does Wurtzel's world view provide a mortal carte blanche when "God's chosen" deal with the "not chosen?"

What does this imply for the rest of humanity? How are we to interpret this concept in a broader sense, beyond the concept of Israeli occupation and massacres in Palestine? What, for example, does this imply in the context of the United States, where a small number of "God's chosen people" live amidst vast quantities of "not chosen" types? And how are we to understand it when "God's chosen" appear not to thrive?

Wurtzel's assertion that the Israelis are "God's chosen people" requires serious consideration by both "chosen" and "not chosen" people. I think Mr. Wurtzel owes us a clarification of these and other basic questions implied by his "God's chosen people" defense of Israeli brutality in Palestine.

Scam alert

To the editor:

Students should be aware of the following scam operating in the Amherst area: A van, usually white, will pull up to you in a public place like a parking lot. The occupant(s) will start telling you a story along the lines of, "Well, you won't believe this, but the stereo store where I work received a large overrun of speakers from the manufacturer. My manager doesn't know about it, and I was wondering if you would like to help me out." He'll then offer you a set of high-end speakers for a fraction of what they would normally cost.

Of course these speakers are of inferior quality, with only the name-brand nameplates tacked onto the front of the cabinets.

These crooks have been operating in the Northeast for 10 years. If they approach you, ignore them. If you take their bait, you will be ripped off.

Dole posters defaced

To the editor:

The other night, someone defaced some of my Dole posters I had hanging in my hall. Now, I understand some people on this campus do not like him, but this shows a great deal of immaturity on the part of this individual. It does not help me to convert the Clinton vote when I see such actions taken on behalf of Clinton.

To add insult to injury, the person wrote "Fuck patriarchy, more government is worse government." It becomes more obvious that this person has not done any research on what the Dole platform is. Whoever defaced this poster should read up some on Dole/Kemp. Their platform is smaller government, lower taxes, a balanced budget, reduced deficit and more jobs. Dole thinks government should have less interference in your life. He knows the current welfare system is set up so you become dependent on the government and wants to reform it to become more of an assistance program and less of a lifestyle. He wants Americans to become more independent. Hmm, sounds like whoever destroyed my poster should vote for Dole.

If you are going to hate a candidate from any party in any political race, know why. Learn any candidate's position on the issue. Hating a candidate because of party ties is as ignorant as racism and sexism, at least know the reason why you hate a candidate so you can defend your position when confronted.

Crusade carried on too far

To the editor:

I was outraged when the Sept. 30 article by Shymala Ivatury and Hussein Ibish was brought to my attention. Although I have long ago abandoned the practice of wasting my temper over Mr. Ibish's articles, I feel that this and Ivatury's latest crusade against Barbara Burn and the staff of the IPO has gone way too far.

Being a foriegn student myself, I can only hope that the uncivil misintrepretation of the IPO memorandum is not taken seriously. In my three years at this University, the IPO staff, in particular the team attacked by your columnists, has worked hard to provide invaluable assistance and service to foreign students. I cannot express anything but my highest respect for the authors of the memorandum with whom I have been in contact personally.

In a pompous manner, Ivatury and Ibish demand immediate replacement of IPO leadership because of its "chauvinistic attitudes." Whereas calling somebody a "foreign student" is an outright manifestation of chauvinism, "international student" is still not quite PC, but is less "pejorative," according to the columnists.

The IPO is therefore accused of stigmatizing foreign students as an extraneous element of the University community. This ridiculous claim is augmented with other misconstructions and out-of-context quotations to portray the IPO staff as a vicious group of people, whose objective is to stigmatize, humiliate and discriminate against foreign students and scholars on this campus. The authors of the article conclude by recommending that a "decontamination squad" be sent in.

The frightening fact is that Ivatury's and Ibish's incivility can repeatedly be observed in the effrontery of of the GSS members. The witch hunts against politically incorrect have grown into outright threats and insults apparently directed at whoever proves to be the most convenient target at the moment. At the very least, the unethical and misleading journalism of this sort casts a bad light on the agenda of this newspaper's editorial policy. I would recommend you seriously reconsider Ibish's and Ivatury's appointments as Collegian Columnists.

A few loose ends

A friend once questioned the value of studying the past.

"I wasn't there so history doesn't matter," the aspiring chemical engineer once said.

Quite the contrary because, simply stated (and brace yourselves for this), a study of history is a study of the future because the future, and the present, ultimately does become the past.

This is not saying that historians know what will happen in the immediate future. However, history has proven that some events will happen again.

Each and every great world power ultimately does fall down. Think about the fact that, at one time, the sun never set on the British Empire. Likewise, consider what is presently happening in Russia, the former Soviet Union.

Lastly, at its peak the Ottoman Empire, which lasted nearly five centuries, was the world's most efficient bureaucratic structure.

It, too, crumbled and splintered.

Topkapi Palace in Istanbul, from where the foremost of the Ottoman sultans ran the government and where the leader lived, has been closely compared to the current standing of the White House.

Yet as stated, revealing the direct future is not a historian's capability.

This, however, is where I yield to my esteemed colleague Martin F. Jones.

One of the finest sights that I have seen recently was over this past weekend, when I was passing by the Richard F. Garber field on my way to Boyden.

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team was battling Xavier on Sunday and I would have loved to watch more, yet the gym was calling me.

We were up 1-0 when a Xavier player commanding the ball well outside the UMass box broke free. Some scant seconds later he planted his right foot's laces behind the ball and unleashed a fierce shot toward the lower right corner of the far post.

To be sure, that ball would have blistered the back of the net. Our netminder, who was centered perfectly in the crease, appeared to have been beaten.

He dove to his left and with both gloved-hands he snapped that fireball right out the air.

What could be finer than authentic fútbol during October?

How sweet it is.

One year ago right now I was fortunate to have been with friends in central Turkey, visiting ancient Roman and Ottoman ruins, exploring underground cities and riding camels.

Shortly thereafter, we headed North and gallivanted around Istanbul and the city's different attractions for a few days before returning to the Eastern Mediterranean to begin the semester.

Little did we know that within the next three weeks the Middle Eastern political scene would become so intense.

Wherever we were in this exotic Muslim country not only did salesmen consistently try to sell us carpets but we also heard the five-times daily Islamic call to prayer, which added to the interesting environment.

If anyone has the opportunity to visit Turkey, seize it. We experienced a moderate country with kind and genuine hosts.

Start saving now, for the Games of the 2004 Olympiad are projected to be in Istanbul.

Someone stuck her tongue out at me the other day.

Yeah, it was mid-morning one day last week when I sat down in class. I wasn't even late, as classmates were trickling in behind me.

People often roll their eyes or sometimes flick the bird (after this, my friends, always wave back or wink in response), but it has been quite a while since someone has stuck out their tongue.

Message to that particular someone: Buenos dias a ti, chiquita.

So the chemistry in the Middle East intensifies, and campus-wide critics, who consistently argue the same side, even further distinguish themselves.

Does anyone else out there find it as strikingly remarkable that the same people here are always arguing anti-Israel, regardless of who has really been fanning and gassing the flames?

Not that activism isn't encouraged but to think that some believe that they are fooling anyone by hiding beneath a thin veil.

Why else would the same people incessantly harp on and obsess over the same issue from the same angle?

Please, level with us. Why must you be so shy?

Take a deep breath and think

I am not a peaceful person. Most people aren't these days. Even the pacifists are militantly so. However, besides kicking the stuffing out of the occasional gay basher or holiday rapist, I never thought I would find much rabid conflict on this campus.

We all view rabid conflict daily on the evening news; genocide in Bosnia, civil war in multiple African nations pulling themselves together after colonialism and the constant paramilitary actions in the Middle East. I never thought any of these conflicts, or the views behind them, would find there way to this campus. I was wrong.

I love Jewish culture. Granted, a few thousand years ago it wasn't to much fun. You mouth off to your parents, you get killed. You say "god dammit", you get killed. You have sex with your unmarried boyfriend, you get killed. (Though the same could be said for fundamentalist Christian governments.) Needless to say, they have chilled in the past few thousand years and, as a whole, are a pretty fun group to be with. If it was possible to be a Christian Jew I would probably convert.

Few things could have surprised me more then the conversation I had with a Jewish friend I have known for years. She started cutting into Arabs with such blistering and racist comments. Arabs are, according to her, uneducated, backwater hicks who sheepishly follow their religious leaders. They should all be kicked out of "her" country. Was she speaking of the United States or Israel, I didn't ask.

This shocked me. I thought most students educated in this country, and certainly in the Pioneer Valley, would be able to view such matter in a more objective light. This woman had no bombs going off in her backyard nor does she walk by the Wailing Wall every day. Born and raised in this country, these views were instilled into her through media or testimonial evidence.

I tried to invoke the name of history. The Jewish culture evolved. In the Middle Ages most Christian governments were intolerant, war-like with sheep-like populace. If what you say about the Arabs is true, can't they evolve over time as well? The answer to that question, she said, was no. She refused to elaborate as to why.

Well, seeking to prove my theory that hopefully we can be more objective in the United States, I spoke to an Arab friend of mine at MIT. This guy is no backwater, uneducated hick. His father is one of the highest politicians in a Middle Eastern country, was educated in Kuwait and now is in one of the most respected American schools in the world. Here, I thought to myself, I will find someone who can give me a balanced Arabic view on the conflict in the Middle East. Boy, was I wrong.

"Jews are in control of this whole country", he said. "They want to control everything. You think your vote actually counts? NO! It's the Jews!" I was flabbergasted. He then went on to denounce women in general when I told him it was a woman, because, after all, women are biologically less intelligent then men. It has been proven, he said, scientifically.

Silly me, I always thought that the conflict in the Middle East was a two-sided issue. I thought that both sides had valid points and that if these points could be discussed like civilized and rational human beings they could reach some sort of agreement. I thought women were equally intelligent to men, what a kicker. But when what you are discussing includes century or even millennia old religious icons and ideas, it is easy to let oneself be polarized. I thought that distance from the location and the gunfire would give everyone involved some power to view these issues in a more rational light.

I hardly think anyone would doubt that vocal, anti-Israeli people and groups exist on this campus. The parade of angry phone-calls and people storming this office is proof of that. Do people realize the flip-side is true as well?

This column is not here to present a solution to the conflict in the Middle East. It is here to ask everyone who feels close to the fighting to sit down, take a deep breath, and think.

Community members shout in unity from windows down to the marchers below during the Immigrants and Poor march in Washington D.C. last Saturday.

Overall effectiveness of march unclear

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

News Analysis

WASHINGTON — While the approximately 200,000 demonstrators brought to Washington the hopes and concerns of their particular communities, the march for immigrants and poor this past Saturday was highlighted by a number of national issues.

Since the 1994 elections, immigrants and entitlement programs for the poor have come under constant attack by conservative forces throughout the country.

Latino-Americans have been hit the hardest — a reason that this community took the primary role in organizing this event.

The Democratic party, once percieved to be a champion of social reform, has taken a second look at the programs they created, such as the now defunded Aid to Family with Dependent Children.

Immigrants have come under particular scorn. California Gov. Pete Wilson saved his re-election campaign in 1994 by making Prop. 187 a key issue for white voters.

The measure, which was overwhelmingly approved, cut off all non-emergency benefits for non-citizens.

Several speakers at the rally immediately after the march warned those in attendence that initiatives such as Prop 187 are likely to repeat themselves in other states.

The concern was valid — considering that several presidential candidates made their opposition to illegal immigration cornerstones of their campaigns, including Wilson and others, such as Patrick Buchanan.

In this election, affirmative action is under attack; again, the battlground being California. Prop. 209, the decpetivly titled California Civil Rights Initiative, will make programs which the supporters call racial and gender "set-asides" unconstitutional.

"English-only" laws, on several state ballots in recent elections, were also attacked as oppresive extensions of white supremacist ideology.

Viewed by those in a power as a relatively weak constituentcy and hence, politically convenient to exploit, demonstrartors and march organizers intended to send a unmistakable message, demanding both respect and legimacy.

Republicans were not the only party to recieve harsh criticism. The march was held directly outside the White House gates to point to finger at President Bill Clinton.

Many speakers and demonstrators expressed frustration with the not-so-liberal president who signed legislation to eliminate welfare and has rarely been a strong advocate for immigrant rights.

The question on everyone minds is, of course, how effective the march was in articulating a clear agenda for immigrants and poor people.

The agenda was very broad and organizers certainly appeared at times, to be barely holding the event together.

In terms of the presidential elections, the chance that the march will plan any significant factor in tomorrow's debate between Clinton and Republican nominee Bob Dole is slim.

Even last year's Million Man March, a higher profile event, has not played a significant role in recent election discourse.

It will take years to determine whether Saturday was truly the beginning of a movement, as some organizers suggested, but prognosis is not entirely ambiguous.

"People aren't going to understand how huge these issues are if we don't come together like this," said a Latina student from San Diego State University.

If nothing more, the march succeded in just that.

Indigenous leader' life to be presented at LACC

Broken Silence, a documentary/movie on the life of Human Rights Leader Rigoberta Menchu Tum, will be shown at the Latin American Cultural Center on Oct. 17. The film presents the struggles of Indigenous people in Guatemala.

Menchu Tum is a world honored Guatemalan leader who promotes the defense of human rights, peace and Indigenous Peoples' rights. Born in 1959 in the village of Chimel, Guatemala, she was raised in a community that continued the old Maya-Quiche culture for over a millennium.

Menchu Tum followed traditional expectations of an indigenous woman, working first in the fields and later in the city as a domestic employee. Throughout her life she struggled with injustice, misery and discrimination, which Indigenous Peoples of Guatemala are victims of.

She has lived through the torture and assassination of several members of her family, including her father and brother, by the repressive armed forces of the United States supported Guatemalan government.

Menchu Tum is a self-educated woman who at a young age has shown her abilities as a leader, by becoming an active political worker in labor, campesino and human rights groups as well as in the defense and promotion of the rights and values of Indigenous Peoples. Her work made her the perfect target of persecution by her own government. In 1980 she was exiled to Mexico.

In 1983 Menchu Tum published her testimonial book, Yo Rigoberta Menchú (I Rigoberta Menchu, An Indian Woman in Guatemala), followed by many of her texts and poems.

Menchu Tum received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1992. With the funds she received from the Nobel Peace Prize and support of international institutions, she established the Rigoberta Menchu Tum Foundation.

The goals of the Foundation include: the defense and promotion of the human rights, specially the rights of the Indigenous Peoples, the support of the struggle for peace and the development of the rights and values of Indigenous Peoples.*broken Silence will be shown at Latin American Cultural Center. Tuesday, October 22: Will You Be Wearing Black That Day?

Wear black on October 22. Wear black on that day because...

•because of Anthony Baez, 29-years-old, strangled to death by police in the Bronx on December 22, 1994 — after a football accidentally hit a cop car...

•because of Aswan Watson, 23-years-old, shot 24 times and killed by police on June 13, 1996 in Brookly while sitting in a car, unarmed, with his hands in the air...

•because of Yong Xin Huang, 16-years-old, a 9th-grade honor student shot in the head and killed by a NY police officer — who first threw him through a plate-glass window...

•because of people killed by police in cities and towns all across the country...

•because they build new prisons every month, while our children must go to school in closes and our youth walk empty, hopeless streets...

•because they have put one out of three young black men in our major cities in jail, on probation or in some other way under the control of the authorities...

•because they treat immigrant brothers and sisters as outlaws simply because they were not born here...

•because now we find that the horrible violence of the crack trade came to us courtesy of the CIA...

Wear black because the victims of police murder can't, but you can. Wear black to commemorate the victims, to break the silence and say police murder must stop! Wear black on October 22 means that you resist! It means that you are making a statement that will speak louder than the lies of the politicians — it says that you are part of a movement to 'Stop police brutality, repression and the criminalization of a generation!' Wearing black makes you part of a wave of resistance that will begin to turn the tide on this.

A STATEMENT BY THE PATRIARCHS, BISHOPS, CLERGY AND PEOPLE OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES OF JERUSALEM

Jerusalem Peace Walk
Sunday, September 29, 1996 4:00 pm
St. Anne's Church, The Old City of Jerusalem

Our Dear Brothers and Sisters,

For the past few days we have been going through the way of the cross. Together we have experienced feelings of pain and bitterness as we lived through the events that have shaken Jerusalem and the whole of our country, events that have lead to death of scores of people and the wounding of hundreds.

Our first response as Christians in the midst of crises is the response of prayer. We cry out to God to have mercy on all of us, and to grant wisdom to the leaders of all the peoples of this land so that they might make the right decisions that will put an end to bloodshed and lead us to a just peace.

As we lift our voices in prayer, we wish to emphasize three principles that spring from the core of our faith in God and grow out of the experience of the Christian Church in this country for the past 2000 years.

1. Peace and security in our country cannot prevail unless they are established on justice. We believe that God is the God of justice and righteousness. God does not accept oppression, but calls on all of us as members of one human family, Arabs and Jews, to make justice and to love righteousness. God does not accept the domination of the powerful or their arrogance. Our faith assures us that any effort by the governing authority to impose peace in our country, which is not established on justice and righteousness will lead to failure and disaster. We, therefore, urgently call on the Israeli government to pursue the peace process with all seriousness and to carry out all its obligations to our people. We urge the Israeli government to change its attitude and purify its motives. Peace cannot be imposed by the power of arms. Brutality will not lead to security. Stability cannot be established by way of injustice and the denial of rights. Justice must come first, and then peace will follow; a peace that will lead to security. We as Christians feel that the Israeli government's formula for peace is flawed. Its slogan is: security first and then peace. Such a formula casts justice aside and will never bring peace. As the prophet Isaiah has said: "The effect of justice will be peace and the result of justice, quietness and security forever" (Isaiah 32:17).

2. Our faith teaches us that there is no difference between the life of one person and another. There is no difference in God's eyes between Jew and Palestinian, between Arab and foreigner. God is the creator of all. As believers in one God, we plainly state that all must live under the same law. We, therefore, call on the Israeli government to bring all its discriminatory policies to an end. Palestinians should have rights in their country, just as Jews have rights in their country. This is the only way that peace can prevail. Every time the Israeli government gives preferential treatment to Jews over Palestinians, it sows the seeds of hatred and violence and thus is responsible for the growth of animosity towards its own people. We urge the Israeli government to abstain from the confiscation of land, to return confiscated land to its rightful owners, to stop the demolition of homes, to release all prisoners and detainee, to remove roadblocks and to respect all signed agreements. We call upon the Israeli government to close the recently opened tunnel, to refrain from causing insult and humiliation to the Palestinian people and treat the Palestinians as genuine partners, who are seeking a life of freedom and dignity in their own country and on their own land. Racial discrimination does not lead to peace or security. Discrimination cannot be the basis for building trust between the two peoples.

3. The opening of the tunnel in the Old City of Jerusalem was only the straw that broke the camel's back. However the opening of the tunnel itself has great significance for it has touched the religious nerve of our Muslim brothers and sisters. The religious nerve in our country is the most sensitive nerve of all. A just and democratic government does not violate the religious sensibility of others in this way. The easiest line to kindle is the fire of religious emotion. For our Muslim brothers and sisters, the opening of the tunnel is a prelude to the opening of other tunnels which will inevitably lead to breaking into the compound of Mosque and the occupation of a part of it. Further archeological claims near the tunnel might also affect Christian sites and restrict pilgrims in the area. Therefore, what is required is the closure of the tunnel, along with a pledge to the Muslim community that the Israeli government will never allow an infringement of any part of the Mosque compound or any violation of Muslim or Christian holy places.

"Jerusalem first" is now a priority. It is the heart of the conflict and the key to peace. When the closure of Jerusalem is lifted and the two parties share sovereignty over it. Jerusalem will become the city of peace. If Israel maintains an exclusive sovereignty over the city, and continues its "judaization," Jerusalem will never be the city of peace. Any peace imposed by the iron fist will remain a fake and temporary peace. Jews will never feel secure and Palestinians will never submit to it. We therefore insist on an open Jerusalem, the capital for two states: a city that will be a model for the peaceful coexistence between two peoples, Palestinian and Israeli. Thus, Jerusalem will become a genuine symbol of authentic brotherhood and tolerance between the three faiths: Islam, Judaism and Christianity.

We call on all authorities concerned to end the violence, to work for the establishment of justice, so that stability might be realized. We ask God to fill our hearts and minds with love, strength and all that is good, so that our region, our country and our Jerusalem will have the peace for which we all strive and pray.

Archers disappoint on new CD

Jason and the Scorchers return with exciting new release

ARCHERS OF LOAF
All The Nations Airports
Elektra/Alias

There is a great new album out in record stores. An album whose songs range from quiet piano tunes to loud, toe– tapping indie rock — an album whose diversity is representative of the record label it is on. This new Elektra/Alias release is the Archers of Loaf's All the Nations Airports.

For Archers of Loaf fans, this album may come as a shock. Gone are the days of such great hits as "Might," "Telepathic Traffic," and "What Did You Expect." Oh well, bands change. Don't get me wrong, it's a good album, but it isn't the Archers of old and it will throw the old Loaf fans for a loop when frontman Eric B. sings along to a pretty piano tune. Also, I spent a lot of time in airports this summer, and these types of songs didn't come to mind. Seriously, though, with songs like "Assassination on Christmas Eve," "Bombs Away," and the title track, one only wonders if Archers of Loaf had anything to do with Flight 800. Does the FBI have a file on these guys?

If mellow is what you seek, than mellow is what you shall receive. It is a great album for the season — the songs make me think of the cool weather. All the Nations Airports finds the Archers in a more contemplative, textural mode and, in doing so, they have lost some of the bite and power of their earlier work. If you are looking for a great new Archers album, you will be hard pressed to find it. Instead just listen to Vee Vee or Icky Mettle and pretend it is brand new. Pianos, instrumentals, sleepy tunes, and only the occasional git down and boogie song — buy it and listen to it with an open mind. C (Brian Riley)

JOHN PARISH AND PJ HARVEY
Dance Hall at Louse Point Island

A friend once said, while discussing PJ Harvey's career, that she should "Write a melody or go away." I disagreed at the time, but upon hearing her latest, a collaboration with John Parish, I have to agree.

Louse Point looks great on paper. Parish's scratchy, quasi– blues explorations mixed with Harvey's tightly wound vocal and lyrical explorations. It should have been the sequel to Harvey's last album, the astonishing To Bring You My Love. Instead, the album wanders aimlessly — relentlessly repetitious and graiting.

One of the primary problems with Louse Point is that Parish's arrangements are too sparse, with not enough going on to keep them interesting. He seems to be terribly fond of the Beefheart–style blues deconstruction, but without the wild imagination or soul that made it work. The weight of the album, then, lies with Harvey.

The most successful numbers, "Rope Bridge Crossing" and "That Was My Veil," are also the most melodic, showcasing the diversity and subtle power of Harvey's distinct vocals. The rest of the album, however, is full of half spoken monotonous dirges and dry, pseudo–blues rehashes. There is an obvious attempt at Tom Waits–style roots revamping, but without the melodic invention that makes his work so moving. Harvey seems to have abandoned the more traditional pop elements of her earlier songwriting, but has failed to replace it with anything exciting. An uninspired cover of "Is That All There is?" comes far too late, and falls far too short to save the album.

Blame it on Parish, dig out your old PJ Harvey records, and hope that next time she'll lose the stylistic meanderings and write some melodies. C– (Bradley Skaught)

Archers of Loaf don't live up to past albums on their newest release.

Baby girl makes Madonna a mother

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Madonna's a mama.

The 38-year-old pop diva and actress gave birth Monday to a healthy 6-pound, 9-ounce girl, Lourdes Maria Ciccone Leon. Madonna, baby and daddy, Carlos Leon, were resting comfortably, spokeswoman Liz Rosenberg said. It is the first child for Madonna Louise Veronica Ciccone. The 30-year-old father is her personal trainer and boyfriend.

The girl was born at 4:01 p.m. at Good Samaritan Hospital, Rosenberg said. She and hospital officials declined to release other details of the birth, including whether it was a natural birth or a Caesarean section delivery.

Dr. Paul Fleiss, father of Hollywood madam Heidi Fleiss, told TV crews as he left the hospital that he was the baby's pediatrician. Fans all over the world celebrated the news of the baby. MTV ran a series of Madonna videos along with congratulatory messages from fans on the bottom of the screen.

The New York Daily News reported earlier this month that Madonna had wanted a natural childbirth, took birthing classes, considered having the baby at home and planned to breast-feed the girl. Gossip columnists had also said she would name her baby "Lola." Instead, she settled on Lourdes (pronounced LOR-dis). It also is the name of a French city — (but pronounced LUURD) — where millions seek healing each year at a shrine to the Virgin Mary. Maria is Leon's mother's name.

TV camera crews, reporters and tabloid photographers continued to stake out the hospital entrance today, but it was unclear whether the maternal girl was even there.

Months before announcing her pregnancy, Madonna told ABC's "Primetime Live" she planned to take out a personal ad to find a suitable candidate for "the fatherhood gig."

Leon got the job but Madonna did not use him as a "stud service," she says in November's Vanity Fair, which published excerpts of a diary she kept while filming Evita in Argentina. Madonna says she didn't get pregnant for "shock value" and in one entry describes first seeing her fetus during an ultrasound test:

"I was stunned when I saw on the ultrasound a tiny, living creature spinning around in my womb. Tap-dancing, I think. Waving its tiny arms around and trying to suck its thumb. I could have sworn I heard it laughing."

Once she was pregnant, the woman who has mass-marketed herself through incarnations as actress, pop diva, vamp and "boy toy," suddenly became a recluse.

She was rarely photographed while pregnant and was reported to be scaling down her lifestyle this summer. After putting her Hollywood Hills mansion on the market, she moved into a smaller, $2.7 million home in the Los Feliz district, the Los Angeles Times reported.

For years she has said she wanted a child. Her mother died when she was a young girl, leaving her, she said, with "a longing, a feeling of emptiness."

She met Leon, an amateur bicycle racer, while running in Manhattan's Central Park in 1994. Two months later, Madonna was having Thanksgiving dinner with Carlos' relatives in Miami Beach.

"Even then she talked about babies," Carlos' brother, Armando, told People magazine.

Stewart's latest features funk–jazz & dixieland

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

Attention! You might have thought it was dead, buried and risen, but the truth is there in the record store shelves — jazz is alive. True, it's old — it's on the little social security that's still left, but its intellect is still cranking out some great ideas, spreading those ideas throughout minds that are young and new to the jazz world, as well as to those who are veterans (although, as we'll see in this column here, some of those veterans have been pulled more towards other genres of music).

With a mix of lively "re–emergence of bebop" (often shortened by the author to "re–bop") compositions and rhythmic workouts on various world percussion instruments, Leon Parker brings forth his Belief CD. His second album as a leader and first for Columbia has a number of songs that feature Parker with percussionists Adam Cruz and Natalie Cushman playing shakers, frame drums and marimbas in roots–world melodies provided by percussion. Other tunes, like "Ray of Light," "Wide Open" and their fresh, international flavoring of Duke Ellington's "In A Sentimental Mood" have horns and bass on them mixing this "re–bop" format with various percussive catalysts.

Two new Postcards Records releases by Bob Stewart (Then & Now) and Ralph Simon (Music For The Millenium) feature two distinct sides of jazz. Stewart, a tuba player — a position not seen much in jazz since the advent of the upright bass in the '30s — has a mix of songs on his CD that are rooted in funk–jazz, Dixieland and even a couple of blues numbers with Taj Mahal singing and playing guitar.

Simon, co–founder of Postcards, takes a different road, presenting a cosmic exploration of open–ended compositions, including a four–part "Suite First Take" that is quite random at times. He uses synthesizer accents as well on the "Downhill Slalom" part of the suite, with amazing drums and percussion. However, this disc is too random and too cosmic, and the compositions are strung together so that each one melds into a loose, spacey mess.

Not that Stewart and Simon are new to the jazz world, with careers going back to the '70s and '80s, but they aren't veterans of the prime of jazz like Josef Zawinul is. Zawinul's keyboards graced such albums as Miles Davis' In A Silent Way and all of his fusion band, Weather Report's, albums.

Zawinul nowadays, with his recent My People CD on Escapade Records, veers towards the world–beat spectrum. Songs on this CD feature musicians from 17 countries from five continents. Some are space arrangements with voice and keyboards like "Want Some Tea?" and some are upbeat, rhythmic numbers like "Bimouya," written by Zawinul and African–pop star Salif Keita, and sung by Keita. There's quite a large bit of cheesy synthesizer on this disc, but it is by the man who helped bring electric keyboards into jazz, so it is excused.

Redman plays terrific set to sold–out crowd

JOSHUA REDMAN
Oct. 14

Melody. Rhythm. These are the two concepts that drive Joshua Redman's jazz. The melodies he drives out of his three saxophones (soprano, alto, tenor — he can play one equally as well as the other two) provides a motivated pattern for a rhythm section to give to him the appropriate groove to present a complex partnership resulting in some of the best new jazz to hit clubs and record stores today.

This structural phenomenon occurred at the Iron Horse on Monday night to the admiration of a standing–room only crowd. Whether or not Redman was merely flattering the crowd saying that the Iron Horse is, like the Village Vanguard in New York, one of the hippest places to play and one of the best audiences to play to, he certainly did give us a gift, in his and his band's presence.

Starting with the upbeat "Herbs 'n Roots," with Redman jerking his legs to the ferocity of his tenor playing, one could see there was a lot of energy as well as technical expertise in this melody–rhythm structure of Redman's music. The energy may be most evident in the drummer of his band, Brian Blade, who polyrhythmically beat his drums into submission. His performance all night was one to be heralded, unlike his subdued, less visible role on Redman's recent release Freedom In The Groove...

Speaking of Freedom..., with that album's best track, "Pantomime," Redman's band proved they can easily bring the structure into the area of jazz that is the climactic, intense moments of excitement and perfection which John Coltrane's band, obviously an influence on Redman and his band, staked out in the early 1960s.

"Cat Battles," another Freedom... song, brought out more of this excitement, sandwiched in between two moodier, introspective numbers such as "When The Sun Goes Down" (a bluesy number with a pleasant piano introduction from pianist Peter Martin) and "Invocation" (an open number having its way with musical space, with a Chris Thomas bass solo that went on a little too long).

With the final number of the show proper, "Hide 'n' Seek," a funky number with great shared melody between Redman on alto and Peter Bernstein on guitar, Redman showed how much freedom in the groove he really revels in.

He came back after a couple of minutes off stage for a ballad as the encore, "Alone In The Morning," which could possibly have been subtitured for a more upbeat choice.

The capacity crowd filled out of the Iron Horse talking about how terrific a show it was, possibly without knowing that they had left through two doors, the one to the Iron Horse and that of Redman's musical architecture, which was so poignant, it was almost concrete.

Joshua Redman mixed melody and rhythm to create poignant musical architecture.

shadow of their enormously successful predecessors. But when Noel Gallagher drops your name in interviews, that might not be a real big problem.

Birmingham's Ocean Colour Scene has scored three top 15 British singles with their debut album Moseley Shoals, a rock/pop collage with a range of influences. Although lyrically obtuse at times, singer/songwriter Simon Fowler's colors still shine through with hits like "Lining Your Pockets" and "One For The Road." Wouldn't it be great, though, to hear an English quartet harmonize and not sound like the Beatles?

Moseley Shoal doesn't lose itself entirely to being derivative, however. It's well produced with traces of Bob Marley, Stone Roses and even Zeppelin–style headphone techniques — making the entire experience rather pleasant. One track, "Policemen & Pirates," includes some political jeers ("...and I bet Nero and Pilate could easily explain how policemen and pirates get stoned in glass houses...") providing a nice compliment to hits like "You've Got It Bad." Ocean Colour Scene has still yet to completely distinguish itself as an Oasis–less band, but their debut release shows that they possess the talent, if not the intuition, to do so. B (Jeremy Kipp)

JASON AND THE SCORCHERS
Clear Impetuous Morning
Mammoth/Atlantic

It's been a long time since Jason and The Scorchers exploded on the college radio scene — over ten years in fact. In that time bands like Uncle Tupelo, Son Volt and The Jayhawks have cashed in on The Scorchers explosive mix of punk and country. The Scorchers petered out in the late eighties with a series of uninspired and overly slick recordings, but, luckily, a few intelligent record company employees remembered and The Scorchers are back with a fantastic collection of razor sharp cow–punk tunes.

The very first line on the album, before the wall of electric guitars comes crashing down, is "Oh what a rush." Nothing could more successfully capture the spirit of the album — an album that roars from twangy punk song to twangy punk song like the Ramones with a heavy dose of Hank Williams Sr., or Johnny Thunders and Gram Parsons back from the grave with a vengeance.

Gram Parsons' spirit pops up a couple of times on the album, in fact. Once in a blazing cover of "Drug Store Truck Driving Man" (finally done the way it was meant to be done) and once in a moving duet with Emmylou Harris (Parsons' old singing partner.) The rock and country spirit of Parsons is re–invigorated in The Scorchers embracing of early punk and the raw, self–conscious exploration of country.

Clear Impetuous Morning is an exciting return to form — An album that sounds truly alive, with the guitars turned up way too loud, and Jason Ringenberg's glorious, twangy howl ringing up on top. A– (Bradley Skaught)

Ohio State to hit the road, Cooper upset

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) — Only once in the last 100 years has Ohio State had to play as many as four road games in five weeks. But the current Buckeyes can take heart that Ohio State last traveled this much in 1984 — the last time they traveled to the Rose Bowl.

"From a coach's standpoint, you'd rather have games home, away, home, away" coach John Cooper said yesterday. It's worked to our advantage so far. We played four of the first five at home, we play four out of the next five on the road."

It's not like the Buckeyes need a hostile environment to get their attention this week when they travel to Purdue. Wisconsin did that last week, even in front of an Ohio Stadium crowd of more than 94,000.

The Badgers led 14-10 in the fourth quarter and had three possessions after the Buckeyes took a 17-14 lead on Dimitrious Stanley's clutch catch and sprint for a 48-yard score with 8:51 remaining.

"I think there's been some teams that I've coached around here the past few years that probably would have — the way we played and the way Wisconsin played — probably would have found a way to lose that game," Cooper said.

Even though the second-ranked Buckeyes remained unbeaten at 5-0 and moved to 2-0 in the Big Ten, Cooper spoke almost as if his team had lost.

He blasted his kickers. Josh Jackson had a field goal attempt blocked and Mike Malfatt's kickoff after the last Ohio State touchdown floated to the Wisconsin 19 and was returned 17 yards. Kickoffs have been an ongoing problem in recent years, seldom getting inside the 15 - let alone to the end zone.

Furthermore, Ohio State has not kicked a field goal longer than 39 yards in three years. The Buckeyes haven't even attempted one that far in their last 18 games.

"I'm not disappointed a little bit, I'm disappointed a lot," Cooper said of his kicking game. "Those guys on scholarship, all they do is kick. And they're expected to perform. They've got a job to do and they're consistently not doing it."

He criticized flanker Buster Tillman, who dropped one pass and fumbled another that Wisconsin free safety Kevin Huntley scooped up and returned 36 yards for the go-ahead TD early in the fourth quarter.

"Dimitrious Stanley has been Big Ten player of the week the last two ball games. But the other side is not holding up their end of the deal right now," said Cooper, who questioned Tillman's practice habits after Saturday's game.

Cooper said he would evaluate the position based on this week's practices and said he hoped to get more playing time for freshmen David Boston and Michael Wiley.

"Obviously, if we get those guys on the field, then somebody else is going to be off the field," he said.

Cooper also said he was disappointed his defense never seems to turn a turnover into points like Wisconsin did on Huntley's fumble return.

The bottom line, he said, was it was almost immaterial what other teams did if his team played well. Over the next five weeks, the Buckeyes travel to Purdue, Iowa, Illinois and Indiana with a home game against Minnesota sandwiched in the middle.

Lopez on the pine for Braves tonight

ATLANTA (AP) — Even though he's hitting .529 in the NL championship series, Javy Lopez expected to be on the bench for Game 6 tonight. After all, Greg Maddux is pitching for the Atlanta Braves.

But manager Bobby Cox, unable to fathom not having Lopez's torrid bat in the lineup, announced yesterday that Lopez — not Eddie Perez — will be the catcher when the Braves try to even their series against St. Louis.

In the latter part of the regular season, and both of Maddux's postseason starts, Perez has served as the personal catcher to the four-time Cy Young Award winner.

"Yeah, it took me by surprise," said Lopez, who was 4-for-5 with a homer in Atlanta's 14-0 victory over the Cardinals on Monday night, trimming the St. Louis lead in the best-of-7 series to 3-2. "The last few games I've caught for him (Maddux), he hasn't done as well as he did when Eddie Perez was catching him. Hopefully, that doesn't matter to him."

Maddux, who didn't attend an optional workout at Atlanta-Fulton County Stadium yesterday, has insisted all along that it doesn't matter to him whether Lopez or Perez is the catcher.

"Before the game, I will come up to Maddux and talk to him about his game plan," Lopez said. "Hopefully, Maddux will feel good about me catching. I'll try to do the best I can."

The numbers clearly show Maddux pitches better when Perez is behind the plate.

Perez started 37 games during the regular season, 17 with Maddux on the mound. Maddux had a 10-5 record with a 1.88 ERA in 119 2-3 innings pitching to Perez, while the numbers dropped to 5-6 with a 3.52 ERA in the 125 1-3 innings with Lopez behind the plate. In Game 2 against St. Louis, Perez started at catcher but he left for a pinch-hitter with score tied 3-3. Lopez took over behind the plate in the top of the eighth, and Maddux proceeded to give up five runs, including a grand slam to Gary Gaetti.

"He's learned from what happened the last time here," Lopez said. "He doesn't want the same thing to happen again. I'll try to give him a big target, set up on the corners and whatever happens, happens."

Cox downplayed the decision to start Lopez.

"Javy has caught Greg a million times," he said. "Javy is probably swinging the bat better than anybody in this whole series, so we're going to keep him in there."

Perez said he understood.

"I think we have to keep Javy's bat in there," he said. "We've got to get a great game from him like we did (Monday) night. Hopefully, he can catch good for Maddux.

"I think Greg knows how to pitch. No matter who's catching, he's going to pitch great."

Lopez said there's not much difference between Maddux and John Smoltz, the other right-hander in Atlanta's rotation.

"I'll try to catch him just like I catch Smoltz," Lopez said. "The one difference is he likes to pitch more inside than Smoltz."

Roenick signs $20 million contract

PHOENIX (AP) - Jeremy Roenick signed a five-year, $20 million contract with the Phoenix Coyotes today, and the team said he would be in uniform tonight for a home game against the Edmonton Oilers. The agreement ended a 58-day holdout. It didn't come until the Coyotes lost center Cliff Ronning indefinitely after Ronning broke his hand Thursday night.

Bobby Smith, the Coyotes vice president of hockey operations, boarded a flight for Boston on Friday, met all day Saturday with Roenick's agent, Neil Abbott. The contract was signed late Sunday. Smith was asked how much movement took place over the weekend. "All of it," he said. But he said it would not be fair to pin all of the intense bargaining for Roenick, a three-time All-Star at center, on Ronning's injury.

"The No. 1 position that we took is that we wanted him to play for us," Smith said. "The scenario we wanted most was to have him in uniform; the scenario we wanted least was to have to trade him and take somebody else's first-round draft choices for the next five years."

Phoenix, off to a 3-1 start with three consecutive victories, obtained Roenick Aug. 16 in a trade with Chicago for center Alexei Zhamnov, right wing Craig Mills and a first-round draft pick. "I'm ecstatic," Roenick said. "This is where I wanted to play all along."

Roenick, 26, has been working out on his own in Florida and said he expects to be in game shape despite missing training camp. Roenick, who scored 267 goals in 524 games for the Blackhawks, made $1.4 million last season in the final year of his five-year contract.

Negotiations had been at a standstill since the trade, with Phoenix offering Roenick an average salary of $3.6 million over five years and Roenick seeking a multi-year deal averaging about $4.5 million.

Abbott said the contract contains unusual incentives above the $4 million a year base salary. He called them "high-achievement incentives."

Roenick was a Group II free agent, meaning the Coyotes could match any offer and retain his rights and the Coyotes repeatedly said they would do just that.

Northwestern not getting crowds

EVANSTON, Ill. (AP) — It was a perfect fall day, with the sun high in the sky and the temperature pushing 70 degrees.

The home team was ranked 15th in the nation — and that's still pretty new here in Northwestern country, where before last season the team hadn't been ranked in about a quarter-century.

And the Wildcats, who last New Year's Day appeared in the Rose Bowl for the first time in five decades, were coming off an upset of Michigan that put them atop the Big Ten standings.

So where were all the fans Saturday?

Fewer than 36,000 showed up at 49,000-seat Dyche Stadium to watch Northwestern's 26-24 victory over Minnesota, a win that pushed the Wildcats to 5-1 (2-0 in the conference) and moved them up to 14th in the AP poll.

Where were Charlton Heston, Ann-Margret and the other assorted actors, politicians, astronauts, authors, judges and miscellaneous distinguished alums who jumped on the Northwestern bandwagon last year? More importantly, where were all the fans from Chicago, a great sports town that supposedly was won over by Northwestern's 1995 miracle season?

The fact is, the Wildcats are still a tough sell in the big city.

Successful on the field, they are still only so-so at the box office — despite the presence of an exciting offense that features conference rushing leader Darnell Autry.

"It does surprise me," receiver Dave Beazley, a fifth-year senior, said Monday. "All I can say is that we haven't established a tradition here yet. As of now, we are a one-season wonder. We don't have the respect yet where we can fill the stands purely because we are in a class with the Notre Dames, the Michigans and the Penn States."

Northwestern began its turnaround last season, when it opened with a stunning victory at Notre Dame. Each of the next three home games, however, failed to draw even 30,000 fans to Dyche. It took a win at Michigan to finally convince people that the Wildcats were for real, and the last three home games were sellouts.

Apparently, however, the carryover effect was negligible. This season's home opener drew more than 10,000 short of capacity. After selling out the Michigan game Oct. 5 — "I think a third of them were Michigan fans," Beazley said — Saturday's crowd of 35,848 was disappointing.

"We're going to play football regardless of who shows up," coach Gary Barnett said.

Two home games remain. The Illinois game in two weeks is a sell-out, partly because of the Illini's loyal following, but tickets still remain for the finale against Purdue — a game that might decide if the Wildcats return to the Rose Bowl.

"Chicago has millions of people," Beazley said, "but I don't think they really believe in the program yet."

Northwestern's attendance situation contrasts sharply with those of other Big Ten programs. At Michigan, more than 100,000 fans crowd Michigan Stadium each home Saturday. At Ohio State, Iowa, Penn State, Illinois and Wisconsin, sellouts of huge stadiums are routine.

Barnett and defensive tackle Matt Rice sounded envious Monday when talking about the rabid Wisconsin crowd they know they'll confront this Saturday.

But they insist they are happy with the support the team gets, especially from the students. A private institution with an enrollment of about 7,500, Northwestern is by far the Big Ten's smallest school.

"Our fans are the best," Rice said. "They know when to cheer and when not to. They're a loud bunch, especially the student section."

Barnett ranked Wisconsin, Iowa and Penn State as the toughest places in the league to play. Asked about Dyche Stadium, he said: "I'm not going to rank our crowd. I can't do that."

"I thought the people we had in those stands helped us win Saturday. The ones that didn't come didn't help us," Barnett said. "Our kids want to play in front of their peers, and I think we have the highest percentage of students attending our games of anybody in the Big Ten."

You paid seven bucks for this ticket. Seven bucks! To the voice you say, "Could you please keep it down?" Mistake. The voice gets louder. "Let's move," you hiss to your girlfriend. "No," she says. "Come on," you implore. "No," she says. "I've had it with talkers," she says. She reaches into her bag. Drops a squat metallic object on her lap. What the...? Out of th corn r of your y, you see her squinting, slowly, surely screwing two pieces together. A... a... silencer? Geez! This is a side of her you've never seen before. You think, momentarily, that should this case go to a jury, it will be important to have movie lovers on the panel. She lifts the weapon from her lap. What's it going to be? A Colt .45? A derringer?

You forc yours lf to look.

It's sleek. It's smooth. It's small. It's a ... PDA? She's going to threaten the voice with a personal digital assistant? She quickly touches some keys, leans forward. "Computer," she says tersely to the little machine. Great. Now your girlfriend talks to inanimate objects. What's next? Lunch with ali ns? She whispers something else to the machine. Wonderful. She's decided to catch up on work during your date. Suddenly, miraculously, the voice behind you stops. Weird-like, in mid-sentence. You glance back. What the...? It's long. Round. Pointy. A... cone... of... silence? "PDA with a silencer," your girlfriend mutters. Damn, that's good software.

Kurowski two much for sister

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

About 25 members of the Kurowski family, from as far away as Washington, D.C., were among the 482 in attendance at Richard F. Garber Field yesterday to witness a much bally-hooed sibling rivalry unfold upon the mangled pitch.

There Jenna Kurowski, the leading scorer for Dartmouth, tallied a pair of goals to pace the Big Green to a 2-0 upset victory yesterday over her younger sister Emma and her teammates on the No. 8 Massachusetts women's soccer team, for which she is the leading scorer.

The older Kurowski scored at the 10:04 mark by knocking a loose ball through a screen and under a sprawling Danielle Dion in the UMass net. For added measure, the senior forward scored 7:41 later on a 30-yard shot to the top corner of the net that went in off the post; a shot that any English Premier league player would have been proud to have taken.

A slow start by UMass could not be eclipsed by a stronger second half, as the team (10–1–1) suffered its first loss of the season. Dartmouth, meanwhile, upped its mark to 7–2 and greatly improved its chances at an NCAA Tournament bid.

"They came at us hard and aggressive," Amy Powell said. "They hustled and it was hard to get open at the right time. There's no excuses. We didn't give the second and third and fourth efforts that they were giving."

"We just didn't get it going today, never got into a rythmn at all," Emma Kurowski said.

The Minutewomen had difficulty connecting on their trademark short passing game on the garbled pitch which, coupled with a jugged lineup still adjusting to the season- ending loss of two-time All-America midfielder Rebecca Myers, led to a first half that did not please coach Jim Rudy.

"We're good enough to beat this team, we just didn't play early," he said. "We didn't fight until the second half. We weren't hustling. There was no talk. The first half was just quiet. That's as bad of a first half as I've ever seen us play."

"[Due to field conditions] we had to abandon what we do well which is ball control and knock it around. Our goal was to play as ugly as possible in the second half, just knock it up there and fight for it."

The Minutewomen, meanwhile, were busy tinkering with their lineup, still looking for either a solution, or a way to minimize the loss of Myers, a dominating presence in the central midfield for four years.

"It's tough because we're trying to figure out a system now that Rebecca's out of the midfield for not only who would play well in the middle but also on the wings," Powell said. "Do you sacrifice the wings to go to the middle or do we sacrifice the middle to play out on the wings? We were trying to throw new people in the back too, so in the first half communication broke down."

With a more traditional lineup set for the second half, after an unconventional opening set that featured freshman Cindy Garceau starting and Robin Smith in the midfield, Rudy concentrated on rallying his team, its seniors in particular.

Led by Erin Lynch, the Minutewomen played an inspired second half, but could not overcome the early deficit. Late in the match, an energized Lynch defied all categorized positions, covering the 110-yard field from end-to-end as what might best be described as a "raving mad–woman."

Lynch attacked the goal with tremendous technical skill, most notably on a chance where she set herself up with a foot flick with four minutes to play. While the senior captain tried to crack the Big Green defense, she never neglected her own defensive duties, quelling several potential Dartmouth counter–attacks.

"You saw the level of Erin Lynch today and Erin Lynch is one of the upperclassmen that responded to the challenge of 'let's step it up' [and win the second half]. Erin Lynch said 'the hell with this, I'm not going down without a fight.'"

Lynch's zeal, generally a UMass staple, was lacking in the first half. Accordingly, by the 18th minute of the match UMass was in dire straights facing a tenacious Big Green side. UMass could not spur its offense until an extended half time, at which point the team was without a shot on goal.

"If we don't get our stuff together by [Saturday] and figure out what we need to do, we could be another one of [UConn's] 11-0 sacrificial lambs," Rudy said.

Cindy Garceau and the Massachusetts women's soccer team suffered it's first loss of the year Tuesday, falling to Dartmouth 2–0.

Minutewomen lose, Myers injury makes gap

There were many things missing for the No. 8 Massachusetts women's soccer team (10–1–1, 4–0–1 in Atlantic 10) in Tuesday afternoon's 2–0 loss to Dartmouth, which, by the way, was the first loss of the season:

•The lucky bounce — the ball seemed to bounce every which way but loose on the garbled Richard F. Garber Field astro–dirt surface. And specifically in this case, everywhere besides from foot to foot for the Minutewomen, with the first half seeing the spottiest passing game this year on the home field.

On the other hand, it all went Dartmouth's way, as the Big Green must have had their lucky leprechaun travelling with them from Hanover, N.H. The first goal 15:04 into the opening frame was just a mad scramble that went awry for UMass, as senior forward Jenna Kurowski was the one who ended up with the ball, and the goal.

•The sparkling goal—the second tally by Kurowski was one of the best goals that Garber Field has witnessed in recent history. Not since the University of Massachusetts senior mid–fielder Julie Magid's strike from 30 yards out in the 2–0 win over SMU last Sept. 8th has the historic confines of Garber seen such a beautiful piece of bootwork.

Moving down the left flank, the senior forward curved a ball from about thirty yards out around the diving junior keeper Danielle Dion, kissing the top corner of the far right post. All were in amazement, as both the quality and quantity of the goals, goals which left UMass behind, made jaws drop around the field.

•The ball on the UMass opponent's side of the pitch—the Minutewomen could not concisely penetrate the Dartmouth defense before, during and after the scores that left the final score in no doubt. For the first nine games of the season, it appeared that UMass would spend the remainder of their season knocking the ball around the opponent's box. It was not to be today, as even the frenzied freshmen duo of Emma Kurowski and Kate Webb could not make any clear runs into the heart of the Big Green defense.

But what could be the main reason for the apparent identity crisis in the UMass offense is the loss a week and a half ago of senior midfielder Rebecca Myers not only for the season, but for the remainder of her collegiate career.

The apparently harmless spill last Oct. 4th at La Salle has left Myers with one very sore left knee, and more medically, a torn ACL tendon. Being someone who has torn his ACL in the past, I feel the pain. Also, being someone whose athletic career (hockey) has ended because of such a injury, I know the pain that delves deeper than a who, what, or why question from a nosy sideline reporter.

What can you say to someone who put their all into the sport they love, and at the time they see the top of the mountain, have the ascension of the peak taken away from them? Maybe, something like, "Gee, your career is over, how does it feel?" Let me answer that question for you. "It sucks, big–time."

What can you say to the coach that has seen his tri–captain play three and a half sparkling years for him, while breaking career records in points and goals scored, and becoming the first soccer player in UMass history to break the 100 point mark? Maybe, something like, "Gee, your star scorer's career is over, how does it feel?" Let me answer that question for you. "It hurts, big–time."

Since I first saw Rebecca Myers play two years ago, I knew she was a keeper (not in the goalkeeper sense, either). UMass coach Jim Rudy does not have to tell me this, it is a fact. Seeing her on the UMass bench before the game yesterday, I could see the pain in her eyes, and I could feel the pain inside (in my left knee due to the chilly weather, too). Even with my continued love of the sport of hockey, it is something that sticks to me every time I walk into a rink.

This chapter of the book has ended for UMass, and more importantly, Myers. The time is to move on for both, and one thing is for sure, the ex–senior midfielder for the Minutewomen will be fine. It will take awhile for the Georgia native, but in the end, I think it would have to be something earth–shattering for her to leave the sport behind. Unfortunately for her team, they do not have all the time in the world, and they must find that missing piece.

Yanks go to the Series, Braves still the favorites

I know what you're thinking. Hey, where's Fred? Well, to be honest, I got sick of him using booty schwag out of context, and I had him fired.

Relax, people. I'm just kidding.

This week it's my turn to fill you in on all the latest dirt concerning our national pastime. But, be advised, there's only one Fred Hurlbrink Jr. I'll do my best to honor his legacy.

Let's start in New York, where the Yankees have won the right to go to their first World Series since 1981. To give you an idea of just how long ago that was, Fernando Valenzuela was a rookie in 1981. I realize that there is a lot of anti–Bronx Bomber feeling here in the Commonwealth, and believe me I feel it myself, but from an objective standpoint, I have to give it up to the Yanks. They've played hard all year, getting gotten gritty performances from ailing front–liners like Jimmy Key and David Cone, and wounded starters like Paul O'Neil and the chicken man himself, Wade Boggs. Fact is, this 1996 Yankee squad is a great baseball story, and in this time of fan discord and player spit scandals, great stories is what the game needs.

Can they win it all? Maybe. I don't think they realize how tough it's going to be to play after a week off, despite the much needed rest it'll give O'Neil and that pitching staff. Right now they're hot, and they do have the fortune of having home–field advantage in the Series. But if Bernie Williams cools off, and the starters can't get to Mariano Rivera with a lead, New York will find itself, like Zima and Vanilla Ice, done.

Over in the senior circuit, tonight is Game Six in the NLCS, with the Cards holding a tenuous 3–2 lead. I'm gonna let you in on a little secret, kids. The Braves still win this thing. You know why? Pitching, that's why. Greg Maddux goes tonight, and you best believe he remembers the shelling he got in Game Two. The Redbirds send Andy's little brother Alan Benes to the hill. Alan is a rookie, Maddux is a four time Cy Young winner. Hmm. who's got the edge?

There are other reasons why I still believe in the Bravos. Look into the Cardinals eyes, and listen to their post–game quotes. They're still mystified at the fact that they're there. Yes, they have some postseason experience, but they have nothing compared to the Braves. You put kids like Ray Lankford, Brian Jordan and John Mabry into Fulton–County with a series on the line, with 50,000 or so crazed Georgians (but hey, aren't all Georgians crazed?) Tomahawk chopping and carrying on like they do, and you've got a tough road ahead. If they pull it off, hey, give them props. But if you're a betting man, and I know some of you are, take Atlanta. Experience is golden in October.

The NL West, which provided the only excitement in the last weekend of the season, rolled over and died in the playoffs last week, with the Dodgers and Padres going a combined 0–6. What happened?

Simple wear and tear, that's what. In the race to win the division, both Los Angeles and San Diego beat themselves up. On the other hand, the Cardinals had the fortune of having the Astros die about mid–August, and the Braves knew they were going to the postseason from opening day. There's a certain comfort that comes with the assumed fact that you'll be playing in October. You can rest your starters, work in some rookies, and generally just relax and get your mindset on the playoffs. LA, and the Padres didn't have that luxury, and they're weren't ready, thus the whupp–in's.

Has anyone else noticed Fox's coverage of the playoffs? I have to say impressed. I expected things such as a red streak to show where the ball went and cartoon sluggers bashing the hell out of each other after home runs, but they've managed to stay away from that sort of two–bit flim flam hokey stuff. I still want to throttle Tim McCarver's throat half the time, but Joe Buck has done an excellent job, and the hot–zone graphics and what not are really good.

As for NBC, I don't know what to say. Bob Costas just didn't sound like his usual self. I though he was trying too hard for some reason, when in fact Costas really doesn't have to try at all, because he's usually one of the best. The real problem came when Bob Uecker opened his mouth. They had Joe Morgan, one of the best analysts around, in the booth, and Uecker wouldn't let him get a word in edge– wise. Hey, Bob. Shut up!

Byars a Pat, Gator gone, UCLA cleared

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston Red Sox made it official Tuesday: they don't want Mike Greenwell back.

The expected announcement came nearly three weeks after he told the team he didn't want to come back, at least not as a role player after being a full-time performer for nearly all of his 10 seasons with Boston.

The left fielder was one of three players designated for assignment as the club shuffled its 40-man roster.

Boston also designated for assignment infielder Bill Selby and pitcher Bob Milacki and added first-baseman designated hitter Bo Dodson, infielder Roberto Mejia and outfielder Adam Hyzdu to the roster.

In a statement released by the Red Sox, General Manager Dan Duquette said, The Red Sox appreciate Mike Greenwell's long tenure of service in a Red Sox uniform."

Greenwell, 33, said on Sept. 26, with four games left in the season, that he wouldn't be coming back to the Red Sox after his contract expired at the end of the current season.

He said the team indicated it might have a spot for him as a role player but that he wouldn't accept that role in Boston, although it might be all right elsewhere. He also complained that Duquette had problems communicating with players.

Boston appears to be grooming infielder Wil Cordero for the left-field spot.

Greenwell batted .295 with seven homers and was limited by injuries to 77 games last season. He has a .303 career average with 130 homers in 1,269 games.

Selby spent part of the 1996 season with Boston, while Milacki was signed after the season. Dodson and Mejia played this season at Triple-A Pawtucket, while Hyzdu was at Double-A Trenton..

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Keith Byars signed with the New England Patriots on Tuesday, two weeks after being released by the Miami Dolphins and a month after his streak of 130 games with at least one catch ended.

The Patriots made room for him by placing rookie fullback Kantroy Barber on injured reserve with a shoulder injury they said he incurred in practice.

Byars, converted to tight end this year after spending his other 10 NFL seasons as a fullback, is expected to return to his old position, backing up Sam Gash. He gives the Patriots (3-3) a proven receiving threat at that spot.

His 130-game streak ended in the third game this season against the New York Jets. In four games with Miami this season before being released Oct. 1, he had five catches for 40 yards. Two of them came in a season-opening 24-10 win over New England.

Of his 146 NFL games before this season, Byars started 134, including all 41 he played with Miami. He joined the Dolphins in 1993 as an unrestricted free agent after seven seasons with Philadelphia.

He had at least 50 receptions in seven of his last eight seasons

LOS ANGELES (AP) — UCLA basketball coach Jim Harrick has reportedly been cleared of violating NCAA rules in the sale of a car he owned to the sister of a top recruit.

Neither the Pacific-10 nor UCLA would comment Tuesday on reports that a conference investigation had not turned up any wrongdoing by the Bruins coach.

Both the conference and the university have been looking into the sale of a car by Harrick's son, Glenn, to Lisa Hodoh on Sept. 20.

The sale came two days after Baron Davis, the woman's younger brother, verbally committed to play for the Bruins. Davis is a highly recruited 6-foot-1 point guard who began his senior year at Santa Monica Crossroads High last month.

Russian accuses rival of plotting 'mutiny'

MOSCOW (AP) - The battle for power around an ailing Boris Yeltsin took a sharp new turn yesterday when Russia's interior minister accused his rival, Alexander Lebed, of plotting a "mutiny" and announced he was calling a security alert in major cities.

The sensational allegation by Interior Minister Anatoly Kulikov, who heads the nation's police, was immediately denied by Lebed as a provocation and nonsense. Lebed, the national security chief, has made no secret of his desire to be president but says he supports the democratic system.

Yeltsin, sidelined at a health spa outside Moscow and awaiting heart surgery, was "highly concerned," said his spokesman. Yeltsin demanded an urgent explanation from Kulikov and Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin.

The speaker of parliament, Communist Gennady Seleznyov, said the accusation seemed like "a practical joke," but that it should be looked into.

Kulikov's accusations were the latest in the war of words between the two powerful officials.

Farrakhan speaks to crowd at UN on crime

NEW YORK (AP) — The spirit of the Million Man March helped reduce violent crime across the country, the Rev. Louis Farrakhan told nearly 40,000 followers who gathered yesterday to celebrate the march's anniversary.

At last year's rally of at least 400,000 black men in Washington, D.C., the Muslim leader led a mass pledge to "never raise my hand with a knife or a gun to beat or cut or shoot any member of my family or any human being."

Those words reverberate in new FBI crime figures that showed a national crime decrease, Farrakhan said. Murder was down 7 percent, rape down 5 percent and violent crimes down 3 percent nationally in 1995.

"I know Clinton wants to take credit for it," the Nation of Islam leader said. "I know the police want to take credit for it. The real truth is that the spirit of the Million Man March should take credit for it."

Farrakhan, from a podium enclosed with bulletproof glass, spoke to a crowd of black men, women and children that extended for blocks around the United Nations.

Where last year's march was nearly all male, the upbeat anniversary crowd in Dag-Hammarskjold Plaza mixed men, women and children. Hundreds of Muslim women, in traditional white garb, dotted the crowd.

Families packed picnic lunches as generations sat side-by-side for the five-hour rally on a crisp fall day. Scores of alumni from last year turned out as well.

SGA committees plan for future

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Undergraduate Student Senate met in committees to elect chairs and to begin planning for upcoming motions dealing with the 1992 ALANA Agreements and the University's snow day cancellation notification system last night.

Among the motions in committee, the Student Government Association President Maurice Caston and Sen. Lia Wong have submitted a motion requesting that the Senate "support the ALANA community in efforts to hold the administration accountable to the agreements they made with the students [in 1992]."

"I want the Senate to force the administration to live up to the 1992 ALANA Agreements," Caston said.

The ALANA (Asian, Latino, African– and Native– American) agreements resulted from the take–over of the Whitmore Administration Building in the 1992 fall semester.

Members of the ALANA community protested the under– representation of people of color in areas such as faculty and staff.

Included among their demands was that the University make the percentage of first year students of color at the University be increased to 20 percent.

"The Senate is here for all of the students. If there was a problem in a residence hall, it would be addressed the Senate," said Luis F. Quirama, co–chair of the Senate's ALANA Caucus.

"The situation is that there is a problem in a segment of the [ALANA] community. The ALANA community should be supported [by the Senate,]" he said.

Another motion that is being considered in committee will ask University Administration to improve how students are notified when school is cancelled due to snow.

"[With the motion] I am trying to look out for the safety interests of all students, but primarily commuter students," said Sen. Bill Ramsey (Commuter Area), who is the author of the motion.

According to Ramsey, the idea for the motion was brought to his attention by his friends who found out that the University was closed during their morning commute.

"Although the current system provides a good service to students, I am trying to expand the current system by accomodating more phone lines," Ramsey said.

In addtion to the committee motions, the Senate voted to unanimously pass a motion that asks administration to supply data on the number of UMass students who have children up to the age of 11.

"It could be that the University isn't providing adequate child care. We don't know whether they are or not due to the lack of data," said Seth Avakian, the Southwest Area Government representative to the Senate.

Avakian introduced the motion on behalf of Joseph Fountain, a senior-political science major.

According to Fountain, the motion was important because it will get the administration to supply data to access child care needs of students at the University.

We need to know how many students have children and how many of those need child care, said Fountain, who has been involved with the child care issue since its inception.

Fountain added, "[Presently] there is full time [child care] available, but we want to expand the full time care or start a flexible [child care] program."

In other matters, Sen. Richard Malley (Commuter Area) announced Chancellor David K. Scott's plan to create a task force to make the University American's with Disablities act of 1990 and Massachusetts State Constitution Article 114 compliant.

Malley said, article 114 states that the state is prohibited from limiting access based on disabilities. The University has approximatly 1000 students with disabilities on this campus, he said.

He added that these students are being denied their civil rights and the student government should support them.

Also, Francellis Nunez was unanimously voted into the position of the SGA Secretary of the Registry.

Food drive raises awareness for hunger & homelessness

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts, in connection with several community service organizations, is working to provide food for those with strained resources by participating in the Make a Difference Day on Oct. 26.

"Hunger is not that far away," said David Sharken, executive director for the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts. "It's not just Ethiopia, but it's our neighbors and this is a great way for the community to help out."

The Daily Hampshire Gazette, the Hampshire Community United Way and the Food Bank will be holding a food drive this week in an effort to raise at least 10,000 pounds of food for Make a Difference Day, said Sharken.

"This is the first time they're trying to do a Hampshire County wide food drive," said Karen Elam, coordinator of the Community Service Program (CSP) at UMass. "So the idea was to pool all the resources into one event."

According to Elam, the University will be participating by holding a quarter and food drive, and also by dropping off and picking up food barrels at the designated areas.

The barrels will then be brought to the Hampshire Mall, where trucks from the Food Bank will pick them up and bring them to their storehouses for distribution, said Sharken.

Elam said the reason for collecting money is because the Food Bank has to charge the 335 local relief agencies they provide food for 14 cents for every pound of food that is delivered.

Sharken explained that the money goes towards covering the cost of handling the food, like staff, trucks and storage.

"I'm hoping this year they won't have to do that," said Sharken. "And we want as much food as we can in our warehouses because with the welfare cuts, the demand is high."

CSP hopes to raise at least $700, which is half the $1,400 that is needed so that local organizations don't have to pay any money to use the Food Bank. The Daily Hampshire Gazette and the United Way are going to be raising the other half.

The purpose is not, however, to simply drop off a quarter or a canned food and walk away, said Walter.

"It's great to put a band–aid on the problem, but I'd like to see involvement in looking for creative solutions," said Walter. "This is one reason for trying to brainstorm with the students."

These donation drives, as well as the Make a Difference Day, is geared towards creating and raising awareness of hunger and homelessness, said Walter. She said she also feels a need to educate those who use these services.

According to Sharken, most of the foods being donated tend to be high in carbohydrates, and there is a shortage of foods that contain enough protein.

Dole goes on offensive in debate

Challenger accuses President of an unethical administration

By John King
Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — Determined to revive his White House hopes, an aggressive Bob Dole accused President Clinton in last night's debate of presiding over an administration with "scandals almost on a daily basis." Clinton sought to deflect Dole's rapid-fire criticism, saying "no attack ever created a job."

Staring at Clinton and chopping his hand in the air, Dole said, "I am going to keep my word to you." He then turned to the audience and said, "I am going to keep my word to the American people."

Dole put 35 years of congressional debating to good use in the town hall-style debate, treating audience members as if they were House or Senate colleagues, often leaning on his lectern as was his Senate trademark.

In an ABC News telephone poll of people who watched the debate, 56 percent said Clinton won, 27 percent said Dole did better and 14 percent called it a tie.

Dole said Clinton had promised to cut taxes, then raised them, and talked of curtailing programs with racial quotas, but eliminated only one. He labeled Clinton's 1994 health care initiative an "extreme-right plan" and made passing reference to controversial political contributions the Democratic Party received from members of an Indonesian banking consultant with ties to Clinton.

Trust was a central Dole theme. He said Clinton had violated the public's trust with administration "scandals almost on a daily basis," reminding the audience that the White House had collected sensitive FBI files on prominent Republicans. When Clinton labeled Dole's $548 billion tax-cut plan a "scheme," Dole vigorously protested.

Clinton plan helps schools

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

Either Republican Presidential nominee Bob Dole has hammered the final nail in his electoral coffin for attacking the character of President Bill Clinton, or the Democratic nominee will blow the whole contest for failing to respond to allegations raised by his challenger.

News Analysis

The political world knew last night that Dole had to present a more unforgiving posture in San Diego if he hoped to take any momentum out of the Clinton campaign. This meant an obvious route — attacking the President on issues such as Whitewater and the discovery of confidential FBI files in the White House.

Clinton did his best to prevent these criticisms from determining the direction of the debate by insisting that the only relevant issues were those relating to the social services, the economy, education and the environment.

For the most part, he was successful, although public opinion polls may tell a different story in the coming days.

Clinton, once again, kept his Award nominations open; Quality teaching honored

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Correspondent

The Center For Teaching is currently accepting applications from all University of Massachusetts students and alumni for the annual Distinguished Teaching Award.

Created in 1962, the Distinguished Teaching Award has given recognition to 96 faculty members and 69 teaching assistants.

It is regarded as the most prestigious teaching award at UMass.

Mary Deane Sorcinelli, director of the Center For Teaching and coordinator for this year's competition, said, "This is a great award because it is essentially awarded by the students.

"[Students and alumni] nominate professors and teaching assistants who make them want to learn, who they can talk to in and out of class, and who know their subjects and are enthusiastic," she added.

Once nominations have been collected, a screening committee of between four and six (two faculty members, one or two graduate students and one or two undergraduate students) is assembled.

They collect portfolios from the nominees as well as letters and evaluations from students.

Traditionally, three professors and two teaching assistants receive this award, along with a $3,000 and $2,000 cash award, respectively.

This year, award winners will also be honored with a special dinner and will receive recognition during Commencement ceremonies in May.

"This award is so prestigious, because only students can do the nominating," said Professor Susan Cocalis, a member of the selection committee as well as a 1989 recipient of this award.

While past alumni are allowed to place nominations, a majority of the nominations come from current students.

Sorcinelli anticipates at least 60 nominations this year, judging from past response.

"This award signals that the campus message simple and seemingly presidential. It was in his self-interest, of course, to avoid questions such as whether he will pardon his former business associates in the event they are indicted via the Whitewater affair.

The candidates, again, struggled to contrast themselves, and were able to when audience participants turned the "town hall" style event to education — which served to the advantage of Clinton.

While both candidates used questionable statistics to prove their arguments, Dole was in troubled waters during his attempts to portray the Republican party as a supporter of higher education.

Clinton was more than happy to cite a Republican proposal to cut nearly $10 billion from federal aid programs.

He added that his administration would find the funding to make two years of college education universal and include, for those enrolled in four year degree program, a $10,000 tuition tax deduction.

While Clinton did not say where he would find the funds to make these ambitious proposals fiscally viable, he at least offered to students more than the usual Dole line, which, these days, has become a consistent anti-drug message.

Dole also stated that a constitutional amendment to allow voluntary prayer in public schools would help mend the country's "moral gap." For a college student in heavy debt, however, this hardly seems like anything more than political pandering.

More or less ignored in the past presidential stand-off, the audience directed several questions at the candidates pertaining to job discrimination and Affirmative Action.

Dole made it clear that he equated all such programs to highly unpopular quota systems.

He even went as far to say that he would oppose any legislation which would bar job discrimination based on sexual orientation.

"I don't favor creating special rights for a group," said Dole, who coincidentally, was the author and primary advocate of the American with Disabilities Act.

Here, Dole is best contrasted with Clinton. While Clinton has not been a pioneer when it comes to defining the federal role in anti-discrimination measures, he did not fall into the same trap as Dole.

By putting his support behind California Prop. 209, a anti- Affirmative Action initiative, Dole is essentially saying that the federal government does not recognize the significance of these issues and hence, he implies that they do not represent the concerns and priorities of the country.

For Dole to defeat Clinton, he can not rely on such divisive tactics — unless the public, as many do in San Diego, agree.

challenger

glomerate. Dole returned frequently to the matter of trust, saying said he was a man of his word and accusing Clinton of undermining public faith in government through an unethical and unprincipled presidency.

Reminding viewers that he is a World War II veteran, Dole accused Clinton of cutting the Pentagon budget too much. Clinton objected "as commander in chief," saying his budget was just 1 percent lower than Republican plans for the Pentagon.

Dole and Clinton took questions from a group of 113 undecided voters from the San Diego area who were selected by the Gallup polling organization.

The voters were seated in a semi-circle on the Shiley Theater stage. Dole and Clinton began the night behind podiums, but Dole set the tone by strolling out from behind his during his opening statement, and Clinton did the same.

Dole treated each question as an opportunity to find fault with Clinton's presidency.

Early on, one former smoker asked Dole if he wanted to retract his statement that nicotine was "not necessarily addictive." Dole said he had been speaking in a technical sense and went on to urge children not to smoke. He then shifted into a litany of statistics about rising use of marijuana and cocaine among teenagers. "It's all happened in this administration," Dole said. "They have been AWOL for 44 months."

Clinton said tobacco was an issue on which the candidates had a profound difference: He said he was willing to fight the powerful tobacco lobby and Dole was not.

When one man asked about the rising costs of Social Security and Medicare, it was Clinton's turn to go on the attack. He recalled Dole's comment last year that he was proud in 1965 to have voted against establishing Medicare. And Clinton said the 1995 Republican budgets pushed by Dole would have raised Medicare premiums $270 a year on elderly Americans who could not afford it.

On Social Security, Clinton suggested a bipartisan commission to recommend steps to keep it solvent — an idea Dole also has endorsed.

Both candidates took credit for pushing welfare reform that required recipients to work. Clinton said his commitment to the issue dated back to the 1980s when he was Arkansas governor. Dole said a welfare-reform plan would not have passed this year were it not for Republicans controlling the Congress. He reminded the audience that Clinton already had promised liberals he would change provisions they dislike.

cares about good teaching," she said.

She also said that all of the professors at UMass doing a great job makes her job on the awards commitee very difficult.

Students and alumni who wish to nominate a specific faculty member are required to submit a written explanation of why that professor or teaching assistant is qualified.

Awardees within the past seven years are not eligible. Nominees must have taught at the University for at least two semesters prior to nomination and must currently be members of the faculty or teaching assistants.

The deadline for 1997 Distinguished Teaching Award nominations is Nov. 4. For more information, contact Lori Baronas at 545–5278.

Elam also encouraged students to donate their time and efforts because there is a shortage of volunteers.

"People need access to food, and they also need to access it with some self-respect and not feel they're just taking handouts," said Walter, who hopes these drives will make students think about the less fortunate.

The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. Critics hide behind cowardice

C. Taylor Conner

The School of Management professor, according to my housemate, quite venomously took the Collegian Editorial/Opinion page to task at the beginning of her class.

She lambasted each column and its writer, individually and thoroughly. At the close of her tirade, she asked the students if they personally knew any of the day's columnists.

Who can really blame my friend for allowing her hand to remain at her side after that sort of bashing, whether constructive or just plain nasty?

Who wants to be associated with one of them and risk further scrutiny from a professor?

Embarrassing though it might have been for her to admit knowing one of the culprits, it was just plain frustrating for me, as mine was one of the shredded pieces.

I'll be the first to confess that, in my opinion, some of the works produced by Collegian columnists are not of the finest socially or politically conscious caliber. If the opinions of these writers appear in print, those words can and should be held accountable to their authors.

What must be kept in mind at all times is that these are kids — albeit, ill-informed blowhards at their worst — writing the material.

To put it in perspective, many of the Collegian writers who write about drinking or driving are not old enough to legally booze it up or rent a car, respectively.

Yet, I can't really speak for my fellow columnists, except to say they are students, some of whom are in college to have their views more sharply honed by teachers like the one mentioned above.

Such interaction just doesn't happen when these people aren't even in the room, and probably wouldn't happen even if they were, following such humiliating rhetoric.

As for me, I am primarily a humorist — thus, my intent in most columns is to make the broadest array of folks laugh. Written humor is not an easy skill. It is often a hit-or-miss affair, and is usually the result of much deliberation and forethought.

Much like the stand-up comic, the sit-down-and-type comic feels naked to his audience, and depends on a laugh for personal satisfaction.

(Accordingly, my first instinct for this piece was to challenge the critic to a wrestling match in Dining Commons pudding.)

As a reasonably well-educated man, I do not rely on favorable reviews to make my life complete. I have held the Black Affairs and News Editor positions at the newspaper, both of which gave me the privilege of being immersed in a multitude of issues at UMass, its surrounding community and beyond.

These opportunities also expanded my ability to critically analyze and process information on a wide variety of complex topics, as news writers must frequently do with little time to spare.

But I'm a humorist now. The pointed barbs are kept to a minimum, the commentary limited to the most general sense.

I will not write about my father's death during my freshman year or about the potential ramifications of the 1997 Chinese takeover of Hong Kong.

Not my department.

Pro-life or pro-choice?

Only if I can make light of the loose screws.

Regular or decaf?

Can't say I drink enough coffee to care.

For all intents and purposes, I'm harmless until I see fit to write otherwise — as in instances like this one.

Although I am a staunch supporter of community response to anything that appears in any section of the newspaper, I see it as less than harmless to use valuable class time as soapbox time — it's cowardice.

Would I have known about the teacher's critique if my housemate weren't in that class? Probably not.

Writing a letter to the editor is the most efficient and effective way to address concerns about printed content. It's not just rebutting written words with written words via the same medium — it's playing on fair ground.

Keep your ads off my buses

Bob Dunn

Sunday afternoon I was driving to Northampton from Hadley when, once again, I found myself stuck in traffic which was backed all the way up to Carmelina's restaurant. This, in itself, wasn't unusual, except for the fact that Sunday afternoon the traffic is usually backed up the other way with people returning to Hadley, not people leaving it.

It wasn't until I got to the Coolidge bridge that I saw what the hold-up was.

Anti-choice activists, exercising their First Amendment rights, solemnly lined up on the sidewalk, about ten feet apart, each holding a sign that said "Abortion Kills Children."

Now, I didn't agree with their position, but I figured if they wanted to stand out on a bridge and freeze their asses off preparing to draw the scorn of hundreds of passing motorists, what's the harm?

That's when I saw the centerpiece of this little fiasco.

Some "concerned" citizen was so moved by the abortion issue, that he decided to forgo the brandishing of a sign with a simple verbal message to one that featured a hacked-up, bloodied, disfigured fetus to illustrate its "point." Killing children is wrong but apparently scaring, horrifying and nauseating them is OK.

Now I realize that in many people's minds, because I have a penis, I'm automatically excluded, not only from expressing an opinion on this issue, but from having an opinion in the first place. But, while the abortion issue doesn't affect me the same way it affects women, it does represent one group of people trying to determine how another group of people should conduct their personal lives, despite what the Supreme Court says. That tends to get under my skin a bit.

Don't get me wrong here. I'm not sitting here pretending I'm the great "All-Father" bravely leading the way with spear and lance, wearing my Y-chromosome around my neck saying, "Follow me! I know the way! I'll lead us out of the darkness!" Nonsense.

The anti-choice movement has gotten a bit more vocal and visible in the area recently. In addition to the bridge incident, our own PVTA has been toting an anti-choice advertisement onboard busses lately. The PVTA acknowledges that the sign is a paid advertisement and doesn't necessarily reflect their opinion, but their choice to run the ad says a lot about their character in the first place.

The PVTA is a public service. It provides necessary, safe and fairly timely transportation for people all over Western Massachusetts. It's not a place for a political statement. The PVTA is supported, not only by ad revenues, but by transportation fees collected by the University and by tax dollars. Every year at the Amherst Town Meeting a section of the fiscal year's budget is set aside to subsidize part of the PVTA's operating costs, allowing for fare-free bus service throughout the area. I wonder how many of the people who help support PVTA or how many of the people who ride the bus on a regular basis think this is an acceptable use of advertising space.

How many other political issues do you think would have found their way onto a PVTA placard? The death penalty? Drug enforcement? Can you imagine the furor that would erupt if the PVTA solicited and displayed an anti- immigration ad? Or an ad that denounced homosexuality? The PVTA would probably never even consider running ads like that. Why run this one?

If the PVTA wants to help women with family planning, adoption, or pregnancy counciling, why not just display a public service ad, with a toll-free number on it and be done with it? Why not be impartial? Why not provide access to the service and let the people involved use it or not use it and make up their own minds about what to do next? Why would a public service polarize itself on such a volatile issue, effectively alienating half of their patrons?

This isn't the first time (and probably not the last) the anti-choice movement has paid for advertising space to get their message across. They've used busses, newspapers and now they're using cable television. They're very well organized and apparently very well-financed — these ads don't come cheap. This leads me to wonder where all this money is coming from. I'd be curious to know just who gets the cash dropped into the collection plates every Sunday.

No, I don't have a womb. No, I'll never have to be faced directly with the ethical dilemma that comes with a pregnancy. But, neither do the majority of people who are in the position to make the decisions regarding abortion procedures, accessibility and rights.

My advice to the people on the Pro-Choice side of the fence is to get moving. Let PVTA know how you feel, try to get them to rethink their decision. Try buying ad space yourselves, see if the folks selling the space are willing to display both sides of an issue or if they really do have their own agenda.

The resurgence of ads and misleading information is a warning sign, a reminder of the undermining of years of hard work and hard-fought battles. If people don't start looking more carefully, Roe vs. Wade will just be a debate over the best way to cross a river.

Betraying the revolution

Dan Bodah

This fall you've got the choice of casting your vote for a lot of candidates representing a wide spectrum of political thought. It's a self-fulfilling prophecy to think that only one of the two principle parties has a chance of winning; there's no real excuse for supporting a candidate or party you don't believe in. You can write in the name of someone you do believe in or, if you're like me, and don't believe in our underlying system of alleged "representative democracy," write in a vote of "no confidence."

Another way to challenge the system underlying this whole quadrennial electoral farce, is to vote for a party that specifically intends to put another system in place. This is a promise of the Socialist Workers party. Like an anarchist writing in "no confidence," they don't mind working within the system as they simultaneously work outside it for a revolutionary solution. Why not operate on a number of different levels? But on closer examination, you might find this party is not a good bet for improvement.

Visitors to the Socialist Workers platform on the World Wide Web will find a slew of appealing slogans right up front: "Jobs for all!" "Raise the minimum wage!" "Abortion is a woman's right!" and, for the more daring, "U.S. hands off Cuba!" The Socialist Workers are ready, they say, to bring the concerns of the people and the workers into the center of political attention.

The basic stands of the Socialist Workers call for internationalized everything — health care, unemployment, industry, economy — under a worldwide Socialist government. Allegedly, this government will represent the proletarian class (workers) and succeed in abolishing the clearly exploitative and collapse-prone capitalist economic system.

Once it's in place, this new government will function solely to provide necessities for the people — all people. No more massive military expenditures to fight wars against our brothers and sisters, no more squirelling-away of all the wealth in some corporation's bank account while some are so poor, they chronically starve in their cardboard home just outside that company's front door.

Imagine a world of international unity, peace, and equality. Sounds absolutely dreamy, doesn't it? Obviously, we've all got a ton of objections to this dream — after all, in the Cold War the United States can be seen as a virtual factory for the production of propaganda against just these ideas. "Socialist" and "revolutionary" are such dirty words at this point in the United States, that just breathing them seriously in public can magically cause FBI files on you to form, not to mention result in your absolute censure from the mainstream of political discourse.

I won't criticize the Socialist Workers for being revolutionary, however. Actually, the problem is that they betray their followers. Here is another party that stands up to tell us they will take care of us if we give them our power. Will we endlessly be told by some conniving governor that we should put all our power in one central pool, one unified system, over which they will stand guard? When are we going to stop believing this nonsense and insist on autonomy and self-determination? This is supposed to be the point of revolution — a never-ending change in social and political structures, mirroring the organic, constant change in the human organism and consciousness. We need to organize our societies on a human level; why cling to outmoded, inherently unstable, hierarchical power structures, with their baggage of hatred, slavery and greed? Can it be for any reason, other than fear of self-control, a sentimental clinging to the past? We can betray the social revolution, but we can never escape the constant change that defines us.

Time keeps on ticking

David Chan

Two years ago, at the tender age of 19, I attended my fourth wedding, which was the second one I had ushered in as well. Along with baptisms, they are the most joyful experiences I think anyone can relish. Someone's car could blow up and everything would still be great because people are so happy on wedding days.

But this fourth wedding was like no other wedding for me. It haunted me then, and it's haunting me now. It's not that anything bad happened. It wasn't even because I forgot I had eyeliner around my eyes from the night before (long story).

It was because of what was on the cover of the wedding programs. It was because of what was all over the decorations. It was because of what name the pastor used when leading the exchange of vows. The groom's name was David Chan.

My friend Christine had always been the big sister I never had, and likewise, she considered me the little brother she never had. I knew her before I knew algebra. Now, after all these years, she married a guy named David Chan. I watched her graduate from college. She listened to my graduation speech. Now she's married.

Marriage was once the victim of many of my ridicules, and now the reality hit me hard. As I walked down the aisle with the mother of the bride, I thought, somedays, I'm going to see my name again on a wedding program. It'll also be on wedding decorations. For a second time in my life I'm going to hear a pastor say, "Do you, David Chan, take... to be your lawfully wedded wife?" I had to gulp when I heard those words. Time isn't kind.

I am afraid that I'm getting old. The future is creeping up on me just too fast. When I turned the big 21 last summer, my friends took me out after work to bars in Boston. Needless to say, I capped my evening by taking the subway home looking like I just got beat up. I stumbled home drunk to my parents who were already prepared for the catastrophe. As my mom watched me hug the toilet bowl, I asked her what her 21st birthday was like. She told me that she was married to my father when she was my age. It was not what I wanted to hear, and it did not help the sickness that I was feeling as I hugged the bowl once more. When she was 22, she gave birth to me. Reality sucks.

Just the other day I started to think about the awful "A" word. Alumni. Whenever I heard the word alumni, I pictured old people. I had images of people who were deflated of life and fun because their youthful college days were behind them. I pictured working people yearning for the past as they flipped through pages of lively memories in their UMass yearbook. Alumni.

My buddy, J.J., who was also my roommate last year, is now an alumni. He came up last weekend and bought an alumni sticker for his car. I remember those good old days of holding his head over the toilet on Friday nights, sneaking into the dining commons, and scrubbing tacos from Pablo at Taco Bell at two in the morning. After a blink of an eye he's now an alumni. When J.J. bought his stickers he asked me if I was going to get any next year. I laughed. Alumni. No way!

Then there are job interviews. What do I want for a career? Where do I want to live? What do I want to do with my life? I didn't apply for many interviews so I don't have many to do. I still have more than enough though. I have enough interviews to keep me from shaving my head, and it's aggravating me. It's one of those things that you have to do when you're in college because you wouldn't do it when you're not in college. J.J. did it, as well as many other of my comrades. Now there's just me. Should I shave my head right before interviews? Would I be making a statement at interviews with a bald head? Or would recruiters just think that I look like Buddha?

Well at least I still have the opportunity to ponder something like shaving my head. Before I know it I'll be old and bald anyway.

Letters to the Editor

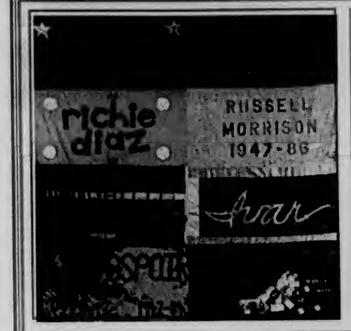
Molitor's column is offensive

To the editor:

This letter is in response to the Oct. 16, 1996 opinion submission entitled "My own view." The author, one Erik Molitor, has seen fit to use the pages of the Collegian to enlighten readers on his views concerning homosexuality. As a result, I've decided to see fit to use the pages of today's Collegian to point out Mr. Molitor's errors and refute his arguments.

First, we are informed in paragraph one that the author is "not trying to offend anyone," only to discover in the column's body that he does in fact endeavor to offend people: namely, gay and lesbian people. Is an intelligent reader expected to take Mr. Molitor's word for it, when he tells us he means no offense to homosexuals? What gay or lesbian person would not be offended by the words of someone that claims to find homosexuality "unnatural and somewhat immoral," or by the reference to a gay family friend as "as flaming as a raging bonfire"? What precedes the latter quotation are the lines "It's not like I hate gays. One of my oldest and closest family friends is..."

Sorry to ask so many questions, but here's another: Would Irish or Irish-American individuals be justified in finding offense were a columnist to write "It's not like I hate the Irish. One of my oldest and closest family friends is as big a drunk as there is."? The point is that the author of "My own view" is employing stereotypes with respect to gay and lesbian people, and is, as a result, expressing a significantly intolerant opinion.



While continuing to insult gays and lesbians with the words, "I am disgusted by the image of sexual activity between members of the same sex," he also insults women in general by adding that he is also "repulsed by the image of sexual activity with an unattractive female." Readers are, as I read the latter quote, being asked to imagine that there is such a thing as a female that may be considered universally unattractive. It may simply be poor word choice by Mr. Molitor, but if not he is making an unfortunate assumption. Perhaps it would have been wiser to write "...a woman to which I do not find myself attracted," if one must be so cruel as to be repulsed (and then to point this out), by a person based solely on looks. (I am assuming the author means physical appearance when he uses the term "unattractive".)

In closing, perhaps Mr. Molitor ought to think about how many women he finds unattractive, and then he ought to think about what possessed him to feel the need to publicly declare his lack of support for homosexuality in "any way, shape or form."

In Memory...

Quilt remembers, celebrates life

Mike Burke

WASHINGTON — Seventy thousand names. Seventy thousand lost lives. Seventy thousand memories.

Last weekend, the Names Project displayed the entire AIDS Memorial Quilt stretching from the Capitol Building to the Washington Monument.

Eight years ago the quilt was first spread out at the National Mall in front of the Smithsonian Castle. Ronald Reagan was still in the White House and the quilt contained 1,920 panels.

For the first time the AIDS epidemic had a symbol, but even the skeptics never thought the quilt would grow into its current status — with 37,472 panels each measuring 3-feet by 6-feet. This represents just 12 percent of all U.S. AIDS deaths.

The dimension of the AIDS Memorial Quilt have grown to monstrous portions — so big that the Names Project never plans to display the quilt in its entirety again after last weekend.

The walkways set in between each panel stretch for 21 miles and the fabric of all the panels weigh in at 45 tons. If a spectator was to look at each panel for 10 seconds, it would take them over four-and-a-half days to make it through the entire quilt.

At 9 a.m. on Friday and Saturday morning, family and Hospitals lack empathy for AIDS patients

Lisa M. Oliveri

For the past few years I have held a job at a small community hospital near my home town and interacted with AIDS patients on a daily basis. The treatment that AIDS patients receive from both health care workers and fellow patients is traumatizing.

It was my impression that AIDS patients would be given the same health care at a hospital as everyone else. Granted the outside world may be taunting and malicious, but I assumed that health care workers would be trained and well educated, I was wrong.

Since the clinic where I worked was located on the ground floor, the clinic was stretcher and wheelchair accessible. So, AIDS patients were often seen in one of our examining rooms. While logistically, this may have been a grand solution, it only benefited the ambulance drivers who didn't have to transport these sick patients very far. The patients were the ones who truly suffered.

AIDS patients encountered a discrimination that I never imagined would happen in a hospital. As soon as they were out of earshot, many workers would gossip about how they got AIDS and discuss their lifestyle. If the patient was a female, people would say she slept around. If a male had AIDS, he was a homosexual. These negative comments came from people who were supposed to help patients. Somehow gossiping and judging doesn't help, in my opinion.

And that was only one aspect of ignorance that I witnessed while I was working.

At the end-stage of any terminal disease, the victim is going to look less than perfect. Sometimes it takes a huge amount of effort just to breathe. Many patients are connected to tubes, respirators and IVs. For someone who has never been exposed to a terminal patient, the sight can be a bit scary.

But fear needs to be overcome by knowledge, not hatred. It wasn't as if patients wore signs

AIDS continues to spread

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) began as a disease primarily affecting the gay community. Today, the disease reaches across all boundaries, without discrimination. The following numbers were compiled by the The Names Project as of Dec. 31:

- AIDS is the leading cause of death among American men ages 25-44, and the third leading cause of death among women in the same age bracket, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC).
- The CDC says, on average, two out of every 1,000 college students is infected with HIV.
- The CDC estimates that there are 513,486 cases of AIDS in the United States. International figures place the number of cases at 7.7-10.4 million.
- By the year 2000, 90 percent of all HIV infections will be in developing nations.
- Worldwide, 1.5 million children have been infected with HIV.

AIDS: Taking another look at the new plague

Seema Gangatirkar

As most of America focused their attention last weekend on the AIDS Memorial Quilt that was displayed in Washington D.C. the severity of the AIDS epidemic can not be ignored. AIDS is a disease that has affected America as a whole, not just a tiny subgroup. For these reasons, it is important to look at the causes and background of this deadly disease.

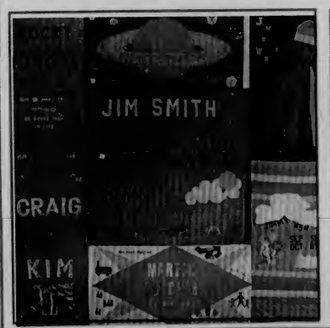
Human Immuno Virus (HIV), causes Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome or AIDS. AIDS is characterized by a CD-4 cell count below 250. Other symptoms of AIDS include diseases specified by the Center for Disease Control such as Kaposi's Sarcoma and pneumoncystis pneumonia. A patient diagnosed with AIDS is also HIV positive.

AIDS first appeared in the United States in the early '80s.

"When AIDS was first discovered, it was primarily among gay men in large cities like New York and L.A.," said Gloria DiFulvio, a health educator at University Health Services.

When first discovered, AIDS was characterized as a "gay" disease or, even more harshly, as God's retribution for a homosexual lifestyle according to some religious activists.

Because of the community most affected by AIDS, little attention was paid until about 1985 when actor Rock Hudson died of the disease.



"People started to talk more openly," DiFulvio said of the attention generated by Hudson's death. DiFulvio also commented on basketball player Magic Johnson's HIV diagnosis in 1991 as another milestone in increasing the public's awareness of the disease.

"There's a lot of lobbying for money for research," DiFulvio said. "Before, there was very little money for research."

DiFulvio credits gay men for spearheading the initial attempts for AIDS research funding.

"They really organized to educate," DiFulvio said. "They were really

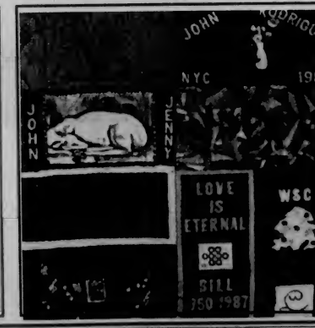
Inauspicious beginning starts Quilt's history

WASHINGTON — When Cleve Jones and Mike Smith conceived the NAMES Project in 1985, they had no idea that their project would start a movement dedicated to providing a means for remembrance and healing.

At a candlelight vigil in November of that year, Jones asked activists to write down the names of loved ones who had died of AIDS.

"We scaled the sides of [the San Francisco Federal Building] and covered it with our placards; they looked like a patchwork quilt of lives cruelly cut short," Jones said in a piece in the San Francisco Examiner two years ago. That night... in the light of thousands of candles held by San Franciscans mourning the loss of two leaders and too many friends, the idea of the AIDS Memorial Quilt was born."



In June of 1987, a group gathered in San Francisco to create a physical memorial for those who had died of AIDS — to document the lives they were afraid history would forget.

"This started out as spray paint on bed sheets, and something happened along the way. It became art," Smith said to USA Today, earlier this month.

It also became a piece that captured the hearts and minds of survivors across the world as people sent patches to be included in the Quilt.

The patches range from religious prayers to personal memo-

He heard the footsteps behind him, the cocking of the hammer. He sensed the sweaty finger wrapping its way around the trigger. "Give me all your money or I'll blow your brains out," a voice mumbled. He sighed. Not again. Frankly this ATM holdup thing was getting, well, overdone. Not even the threat varied. His roommate last week at the convenience store? Exactly the same line. Or I'll blow your brains out. Right. Why not something new... something like... or you won't live to see another sunrise. No, too John Wayne. Okay, Okay, what about... or you'll never get a chance to test-drive that new... Oh, forget it. He scooped the stack of bills from the ATM withdrawal door and turned, calmly facing the deadly weapon. What was it about bad guys, anyway? Don't they keep up? "Give me the money now," the voice demanded coarsely, the gun rising to a 90 degree angle. No, make that 98 degrees; clearly the guy was nervous. The student smiled faintly. Sure, prolonging it like this was dangerous, but this time he wanted it all. The bright flash. The deafening sound. The tiny steel rocket ship skimming straight toward his heart. His jaw flinched as he watched the bad guy slowly squeeze the trigger... BANG! The student ducked quickly to his left, the flash instantly triggering the whirring ATM retinal-scan freeze mechanism. The bullet screamed to a stop a chest hair before impact, the man who fired it frozen in place like some gigantic ice cube, a puzzled look on his face. The police would arrive any second, haul the bad guy away. The student chuckled. Turned back to retrieve his card. Damn, that's good software.

Chapin Hall – Mt. Holyoke College
Oct. 10

SOUTH HADLEY — Considering that last week's A Tribe Called Quest concert was supposed to be the hip–hop event of the semester — it was a little bit disappointing. A Tribe Called Quest opened up with "Phony Rappers" and as soon as they came on, the heads went off. Apparently the school wasn't prepared for the frenzied crowd, who crashed through a barrier, forcing the show to be stopped. After 10 minutes Tribe was back, but the vibe had lessened.

Despite technical difficulties, an awful opening band (bands like Shagg have no business playing hip–hop shows), and the fire department breathing down their necks, Tribe plowed through a 50 minute set. Although the show was short, Tribe managed to squeeze songs from all four of their albums in.

Tribe played the bigger hits like, "Oh, My God," "Award Tour," "Scenario" and even went far back to their first album to bust out "Bonita Applebum" and "Can I Kick It." The crowd responded to all the songs showing that they had an extensive knowledge of Tribe's material — songs from Low End Theory, receiving the best reaction.

Q–Tip and Phife were on point as they bounded around the stage, full of energy. Q–Tip dove into the crowd, and was immediately joined by security who didn't like the idea of Q–Tip not being on stage. Other highlights included Q–Tip getting in Phife's face during "The Hop," which had Phife getting more enthusiastic each time Q–Tip turned towards him.

While the crowd seemed to eat up Tribe's performance, one can't help but feel a little short changed. While Tribe played all the hits that the crowd expected, they didn't show the creativity which has dominated their albums. There were no free style sessions or Ali–Shaheed Mohammed cutting it up for an extended time.

Only their amazing songs and Phife and Q–Tip's enthusiasm set A Tribe Called Quest's show apart from their peers.

Tribe showed a glimpse of what could have been when Q–Tip stopped the jams to talk to the crowd about positivity and the potential accomplishments open for youths.

Uhuru serves up the potent grooves

BLACK UHURU
Pearl St.
Oct. 15

NORTHAMPTON — "Uhuru" is Swahili for "freedom," and free is how bodies swung and hopped Tuesday night at Pearl Street.

Reggae music has an innate understanding of the scientific principles behind why a body moves the way it does, so it's no surprise that the audience of around 350 crowded the dance floor in full motion. In the midst of the band's heavy, beautiful take on reggae, passionate calls for freedom, love and unity poured out in band leader Duckie Simpson's smoky voice.

An hour and a quarter after the scheduled starting time, opening band New Horizon finally brought their theme song out in the concert. The band's performance was well–choreographed for the most part — occasionally too–well, as in the case of the frequent, glam–rockish, guitar solos. By the end of their nine–song set, however, New Horizon was working excitement into the crowd with cheery songs, impromptu breaks, and a lot of goofy stage antics.

After a short break, the one–woman, six–man Black Uhuru took over. Right from the start they commanded attention with bass lines so thick, they vibrated the breath in noses and forced eyes to go unfocused. Huge clouds of smoke rolled up from the grating audience in greeting. "Trouble, Trouble, Trouble" and "Heili" came early on and set the standards for the set: narcotic, entrancing grooves and echoing, dub–like solos near the ends of the songs. Several times these "live dubs" produced segments strangely reminiscent of accordion, other times bringing to mind rumors of military experiments on the potential physical effects of sub–hearing level frequencies. Black Uhuru's reggae is music with an intense physical presence, and the audience was clearly there to respond properly — with non–stop shoulder–rolling, hopping, and hipsway. Presiding over it all, the trio of lead singer Simpson and his two back–up singers gave a joyfully glowing example.

"I Know" and "Break Down" fit into a molasses–smooth stream of songs which was unfortunately jarred by "Thinking About You." "Thinking" started off as a slow, folksy guitar tune which promised a nice change of pace. Then the drums and bass came in, and brought with them an uncomfortable, elliptical rhythm and a cloying chorus. "Genocide," the next song, succeeded very quickly in burying the interruption underneath its massive, dark sound.

As the band wound down its 13–song set, the audience wasn't ready for the show to end. With shouts of "We love you all," Simpson and Co. ground out such classics as "Natty Dreadlock" and "Sinsemilla" during their four–song encore. Simpson made sure to take the time to explain the wonders of marijuana (It's a "cure for cancer and bronchitis," amongst other ailments). That's open for debate, but you can't nay–say the healing power of Black Uhuru's potent reggae.

Aphrodite Jones' latest book falls into garbage bin

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

APHRODITE JONES
All She Wanted
Pocket Books

Even at its best, this is terrible journalism.

All She Wanted, the latest offering by Aphrodite Jones, author of Cruel Sacrifice, is based upon the true story of three grisly murders in a rural Midwestern town. Though it's marketed as an in-depth account of the case, it reads more like a 317-page Enquirer article.

The story centers around Teena Brandon, a young woman who suffers from a sexual identity crisis. As she enters her teenage years, Teena gradually starts to dress and act like a man, and begins to call herself Billy and Brandon.

Teena convinces everyone in her hometown of her newly discovered gender, and seduces many young women — Heather, Gina, Lana among others into her embrace. She uses the same story with all of them — she was born a hermaphrodite and is in the process of going though the "operation."

If her sexual identity crisis wasn't difficult enough, once "Brandon's" true gender is discovered, two men rape her. She then must endure not only the haphazard investigation, but also the stigma of being a lesbian.

Though Teena's life is the main focus of this escapade, other characters filter in and out of her life. John Lotter, a disturbed young man becomes one of her close friends. The nomadic, lost-soul Tom Nissen and wife Kandi play important roles in her life. Philip DeVine and Lisa Lambert are friends that often open their home.

The story ends tragically when Lotter and Nissen brutally murder Teena, DeVine and Lambert.

Sound confusing? This ensemble is worse than a soap opera, but not unlike one. All of these people have slept together, and all of the girls have neglected babies and abusive boyfriends. Because it is a true story, it's hard to criticize this book without passing judgement on the people involved. But their lives read like sensationalized trash.

There are many problems with this book, and considering Jones took two years researching her subjects, it could have been a lot better. The story is an interesting tale of betrayal and murder, and if it was decently written, would be gripping.

Firstly, All She Wanted lacks fluidness. Jones jumps from one topic to another. Her narrative, which is supposed to be chronological, lacks any semblance of time. She further confuses the matter by referring to the same characters by different names. The readers are constantly subjected to hearing about Teena, Brandon or Billy. Without paying careful attention, it's easy to get lost in all the mess.

I find it hard to justify the reason Jones wrote this book. Yes, it is a tragic story of a woman confused with her sexual identity, who becomes the victim of hatred and stereotypes. But this book focuses more on her killers and scorned lovers than her. These people don't deserve the press; their 15 minutes of fame were up long ago.

Another unresolved problem Jones doesn't clarify is how the town is so small that everybody supposedly knows one another, yet no one figured out Brandon was Teena. Are these people so moronic that they can't distinguish this fact?

All She Wanted only strengthens the trashy sub-culture that American society is obsessed with. Daily we are subjected to superfluous talk shows and tabloid magazines and ingest mindless brain candy like this novel. This would be better suited as a half-hour segment on the next Jerry Springer since the audience to which this is marketed probably doesn't have much more than a third grade reading level anyway. F

Hot Halloween hints

Prepare now for dressing up ideas

By Lauren Lobik
Collegian Correspondent

Halloween is only a few weeks away so it's time to begin searching for the perfect costume before the official mad rush gets underway.

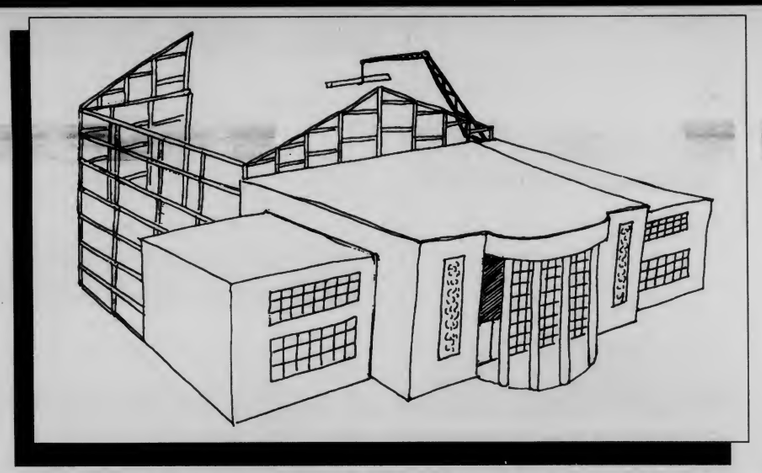
So, what is it going to be this year? Maybe a rebirth of the ensembles worn in the past years, or something thrown together at the last minute?

Being a black cat is way over done. Of course, no one will actually remember what was worn at last Halloween's big bash. If that's not good enough, there are many alternatives. Besides, out of style costumes are out like the '80s.

So what are the most wanted dress-ups for this holiday? According to Jeri Spear, owner of the Costume Closet in Springfield, the men are looking for masks and the women are requesting non-traditional attire.

The most popular masks are those that resemble the likes of Pinhead from Hellraiser and the Crypt creeper from Tales from the Crypt. One recent female customer settled on dressing up as fire. This choice is definitely not the same old ghost or devil.

Renting a costume at a store like the Costume Closet is one alternative, but there are many others.



One way to get the creative juices flowing is to make your own outfit. Joanne Fabrics in the Hampshire Mall has a wide variety of patterns and fabrics to create nearly any costumes; from ghoulish witches and perky poodle skirts to all the characters in The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

If you are still lost for a costume, there is always a last resort — hunting and battling the crowds for a costume to fit your budget.

FAC hosts massive 22nd annual Multibands

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

Looking for something exciting and entertaining to do tonight? Look no further than the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall, as over 500 faculty and student performers take part in a musical extravaganza tonight and tomorrow night.

The 22nd Annual Multiband Pops including groups like the Chapel Jazz and University Jazz Ensembles, Minuteman Marching Band, Percussion Ensemble and more take the stage at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall at 8 p.m. Faculty members directing the ensembles will include Peter Tanner, Horace Boyer, George Parks, Billbob Brown and Dave Sporny.

Only five weeks into the semester, the students and faculty have managed to put together a professional-quality, two hour concert for an estimated audience of 4,000 people. To put on such a massive event would appear to be an impossible task, but the University of Massachusetts Department of Music & Dance has relied on lots of hard work to pull the event together.

"The tradition of Multibands revolves around teamwork," said Tanner, the concert coordinator.

Multibands has been an annual concert for the last 22 years. The concert provides a great introduction to the performing groups on campus and gives the audience a flavor of the musical talent on the UMass campus. And more than just showcasing the abilities of student and faculty, the concert also is a chance for music students to meet other musicians and discover what else is available through the music department.

"This event has great bonding value for our students," Band director Malcolm W. Rowell said. "Through Multibands, our younger students are quickly introduced to other students, other musical opportunities, and to a new work ethic — working hard and working together to showcase the whole department and not one particular ensemble."

For the first 19 years, the concert was held in the Fine Arts Center. In 1994, because of renovations in the FAC, Multibands was held in the Mullins Center, with great success.

COURTESY JOE KUSHICK

Shawn Kelly, percussionist, is one of many performers at the 22nd Annual Multiband Pops in the Fine Arts Center tonight and tomorrow night.

"Our audience grew by 55 percent during that first year in the Mullins Center," said Marilyn Kushick, director of Public Relations and Development. "Increased publicity and the fascination with the new venue brought many new listeners, families, students [and] community members from a broader geographical region than we had seen in the past."

Even though the Mullins Center can hold a larger audience capacity, the concert has been moved back to the Concert Hall because of the better acoustics. To accommodate the audience, the music department will present two evening performances, rather than just one.

Both evening concerts begin at 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. Tonight, tickets are $9 general admission, $5 for seniors, students and children under 17. Friday night, general admission is $15 and $10 for seniors, students and children under 17. There is no UMass discount Friday night. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office. Call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS for more information.

reading, "Hey, look everyone, I have AIDS." Yet I constantly overheard "future doctors" whispering to each other about what dreaded disease was afflicting stretcher-bound patients. The most common guess — AIDS.

I found that every male who entered the hospital on a stretcher was automatically assumed to have AIDS. I'm sure it is not just the people who frequent my hospital that think this way. I'm sure it occurs in many places; from the major cities to the small towns. AIDS is the stigma of the '90s.

So as I sat behind my desk, an unobtrusive observer, I witnessed how these patients were treated. Others in the waiting room would walk away and sit on the other side. Parents would lead their kids by the hand and tell them not to look. Even some hospital employees would duck their heads as they walked by, avoiding a question or perhaps a request for water.

This kind of treatment is unnecessary and cruel. I don't believe anybody would walk away from an elderly person on a stretcher, instead they might strike up a conversation. I guess old age is just higher up on the ways to die list, right?

I'll admit that the first time I saw someone with AIDS, I was a little taken aback. But all I saw was a sick person who needed help; I didn't see them by the disease they had. I'd like to think that others will do the same.

Perhaps working in a hospital, I have become desensitized to sickness and death, but that is insignificant. In this day and age, most everyone knows that AIDS is not transmitted by air or touch, so it's not necessary to get up and walk away from someone who is afflicted.

AIDS patients have enough trauma in their lives — they don't need to experience any more hate. So if any of you are waiting in a hospital room and see someone with AIDS, don't walk away. Have a conversation, honor a request — but most of all, show that you care.

dance of stores in every price range which carry Halloween decorations and disguises. The most affordable is K-Mart. They also carry candy for the trick-or-treaters and accessories to enhance the perfect look. Still can't find anything? Both the Hampshire and Holyoke malls have their share of stores that specialize in Halloween apparel, but beware, the prices at these shops are quite elevated.

It may seem as though it's too early to even think about what to wear to the big holiday gala this year. Don't wait much longer, because you could end up fighting the last minute shoppers just to reach empty shelves.

Need the latest scores? Check out the Internet

As the weather cools, the world of professional sports is heating up. The World Series is almost upon us, the NHL just started, both professional and college football are in full throttle, and hoop season is on the horizon.

For sports fans, it is almost impossible to keep up with all their teams. However, the Internet is ablaze with sites dedicated to the pursuits of athletics. Fans who miss games no longer have to wait for the highlights at 11 p.m. ôr the morning paper because now they can find them on-line.

ESPNET SportsZone at http://espnet.sportszone.com/

ESPN, the premiere cable sports network, operates one of the Web's most highly traversed sites. ESPNET SportsZone is the obvious first stop on a sports tour of the Internet.

Since ESPN is covering the baseball playoffs, this is the place to go to get up to date scores and information. However, other sports fans will find much more than baseball news at this site.

Looking for the latest news like trades and negotiations? Look no further than SportsZone. This site has it all — including horse racing!

SportsZone's only drawback is that it carries a price tag to get everything. Most articles are free, and are a little more in depth than what is found on ESPN's Sports Center. Because of its price, this page is not a monster jam, so it gets a B+.

The NANDO Sports Server at http://www.nando.net/SportServer/

Looking for something a little less traveled? How about the NANDO Sports Server?

Like ESPNET SportsZone, the Sports Server includes up to date scores. However, unlike ESPN's site, the stories are more plentiful and significantly more in depth. Most stories are directly taken from the Associated Press. Every American sport is covered including auto racing, golf and tennis.

This site is not as glitzy as the ESPN one, but it carries no price tag. The NANDO Sports Server is more ideal for people who enjoy reading the sports section of a newspaper, because NANDO is basically an on-line newspaper. This page barely made it into the stnke zone, so it gets a B.

SI Online at http://www.pathfinder.com/si/

Like most magazines, Sports Illustrated has an online version.

This site takes a lot from ESPNET. However, the text is small and compact, leaving it with a cluttered lay out.

Unlike other on-line magazines, the stories are not simple reprints of what appears in the newsstand issues of SI. However, these stories lack eye catching headlines like ESPNET and the NANDO Sports Server. Plus the page simply lacks stories altogether.

However, SI Online has a nice feature that the others lack, a search tool to find back issues. Unfortunately the search tool is not enough to save this site. This page is like a failed power play, so it gets a C-.

Looking for more sports on the Internet? While cruising the Web look no further than Lycos at http://a2z.lycos.com/Sports/Sports_News_and_Information/ and Yahoo at http://www.yahoo.com/Entertainment/Sports.

Then the quilts were systematically opened while the names of all the known victims of AIDS were read over the public address system.

Situated on the lawn of the Capitol Building, a small stage was assembled where 2,000 readers gathered over the weekend including Vice President Al Gore and his wife Tipper Gore, writer Maya Angelou, Congressman Barney Frank, actress Elizabeth Taylor and gay rights activist Candace Gingrich.

The most moving of the Saturday morning readers was the young Precious Thomas, an AIDS-inflicted child who was assisted by her mother. Thomas struggled through the names as her mother whispered them into her ear. The last name was for her friend Theo Jackson who had died the day before.

Although there were moments of utter mourning, especially among the readers (many of whom broke down in tears reading off the names of loved one), the overall mood of the event was surprisingly upbeat. It was hardly a joyous occasion, but for many family members and friends the quilt was a sign of hope.

Posted around the Mall was a large sign describing the event as "a tribute to those we have lost, a celebration of the souls behind the statistics. A means to teach youth about HIV. A way of opening closed minds and softening hard hearts — How many names will it take?"

If nothing else, the quilt brought a new-found reality to all those who have died from AIDS. Looking at each individual quilt, it was obvious that AIDS is an epidemic striking all of America, not just one group. Amongst the quilts were panels for the famous and forgotten, from tennis star Arthur Ashe and musician Freddie Mercury to everyday people like Bill Grenough, whose panel pictured Fred Flintstone wearing a Boston Bruins jersey or Bill Nine's featuring a Van Halen t- shirt from 1984 tucked into a pair of his ripped jeans.

From politicians, to waiters, to truck drivers, to nurses, to children, AIDS has wreaked havoc on America as a whole. It is not a gay problem. It is not a drug user problem. It is not a prostitute's problem. It is simply our problem.

Since 1992 the size of the quilt has doubled and organizers expected 4,000 new panels added to the quilt last weekend. Although it may not be at the forefront of the public's attention, AIDS is not leaving us — if anything, it is not leaving enough of us behind.

instrumental."

The campaign to educate people is starting to pay off, according to Pamela Gonyer, UHS director of Health Education.

"I'd venture people are becoming more aware of some of the risky behaviors that expose to you the possibility of AIDS, and I believe there are greater numbers of people practicing safer sex," Gonyer said.

Getting the AIDS virus is not easy.

"You cannot get it from a toilet seat, or shaking hands. The AIDS virus is very fussy, and it's not transmitted easily. You need very close contact with exchange of body fluids," Gonyer said.

The virus can be transmitted through unsafe sex practice, injectable drug needles and blood products. As such, AIDS is no longer confined to the gay community and should not be characterized as a "gay" disease.

"[AIDS] is really based on the behaviors you practice, rather than being related to who, but rather what and how," Gonyer said.

For those who suspect that they may carry the HIV virus, UHS provides both confidential and anonymous testing.

"At an anonymous test site, we keep no identification records at that test site. It's all done by bar code number. There is no permanent record to be identified as an individual," Gonyer said. On the other hand, a confidential record goes into an individual's medical records.

DiFulvio stressed that the tests do not test for AIDS itself, but rather for antibodies for the HIV virus.

"When you're infected with the HIV virus, antibodies are made to keep [the virus] in check for a long time," DiFulvio said. "As the virus grows and multiplies, the body can't fight it, that's when the immune system becomes depressed."

The tests are 99.5 percent accurate for a positive finding.

DiFulvio warned that a negative reading doesn't necessarily mean that a person is not infected with the HIV virus.

"There is a window period. When you're infected with the virus, it can take as long as six months for the antibodies to show up," DiFulvio said.

DiFulvio recommends anonymous testing for people who may want to be tested, because anonymous testing provides both pre- and post-counseling. On the other hand, DiFulvio doesn't agree with the new home testing kits on the market.

"These tests don't provide counseling," DiFulvio said. "People don't know where to go or what to do."

It should be kept in mind though that an HIV positive result doesn't signal the onset of AIDS. People have lived symptom-free for as long as 10 years or more, before actually being diagnosed with AIDS.

While research has provided newer and more powerful drugs to combat AIDS, there still isn't a cure or vaccine for this disease. But in the last few years, there has been more of a push to understand and accept the disease.

Gonyer said that there is still a serious discrimination program, but she added, "By large, people are more educated and acceptance is more positive than five to 10 years ago."

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

IRONICALLY, THE TIME TO START SAVING FOR RETIREMENT IS WHEN IT LOOKS LIKE YOU CAN LEAST AFFORD IT.

Can't afford to save for retirement? The truth is, you can't afford not to. Not when you realize that your retirement can last 20 to 30 years or more. You'll want to live at least as comfortably then as you do now. And that takes planning.

By starting to save now, you can take advantage of tax deferral and give your money time to compound and grow. Consider this: Set aside just $100 each month beginning at age 30 and you can accumulate over $173,109* by the time you reach age 65. But wait ten years and you'll have to budget $219 each month to reach the same goal.

Even if you're not counting the years to retirement, you can count on TIAA-CREF to help you build the future you deserve – with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over 1.8 million people in education and research put TIAA-CREF at the top of their list for retirement planning. Why not join them?

Minutewomen place well in Head of Conn.

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

The wars on the women's crew scene wage on as fiercely as ever, and Massachusetts is in the thick of it. The Minutewomen placed well this past weekend at the Head of Connecticut in preparation for the upcoming Head of the Charles.

At the Head of Connecticut, held in Middletown, Conn., the Minutewomen entered boats in four different events, and placed well in all of them.

In the open weight division Massachusetts came in third with a time of 23:27 in the four person crew competition. It was the first collegiate boat to cross the finish line in the race. At the Head of Connecticut, as in all of the premier crew events, college teams, regardless of NCAA divisional affiliation, compete against club teams and national teams.

In the lightweight four division the Minutewomen entered two boats. The first Massachusetts boat to cross the finish line was again the first collegiate boat across. That boat placed second in the race at 23:20, just 15 seconds behind the powerhouse Canadian club team DeLosie. The second Massachusetts entry placed fourth, in what was nearly a photo finish, just two seconds out of third place. Its time was 23:40.

In the open weight eight race, the Minutewomen came in second to Ivy League foe Brown with a time of 19:55. The field included such college powerhouses as Middlebury, Dartmouth, and Boston University. Brown finished only 15 seconds ahead of the UMass entry.

In junior varsity action Massachusetts made a good showing, placing 18th out of 40 in a competitive field.

"In the JV race many teams put their extra varsity boats, so it shows they really had a great race," said co-captain Amy Kenny.

The upcoming crew schedule includes two of the premier races of the season. On Saturday the heavyweights compete in the Head of the Housatonic. This race shoves off on the Housatonic River in Derby, Conn., and includes many top crew teams.

The Head of the Charles regatta is also occurring this weekend. Massachusetts will enter boats in the lightweight eight division, as well as the heavyweight eight and four. This is the premier event of all crew races, and the Minutewomen anticipate a good showing.

"This is the most important race, and we're hoping to place in the top three," Said Kenny. "The Riverside Boat Club will be there. They are very fast but we can beat them."

Other competitors in the Head of the Charles include the best of the best collegiate, club, and national crew teams.

garnered another title as Delta Chi came in second. Individual order of finish was Ryan Halliday, Aaron May and Dave King.

Bicycle club takes second to UNH

On Sunday, the UMass Bicycle Racing Club traveled to Durham, New Hampshire to compete in the University of New Hampshire Collegiate Mountain Bike Race. The team went with the hopes of bettering its second place finish there last year, but UNH had more racers and was able to score more than enough points to hold UMass to second place again. Plymouth State College came in third place with RPI close behind.

UMass' Larry Lague had a great race, winning the Men's C class by more than two minutes. First time racer Laura Battaglia placed second in the women's B category and Tara Mate finished right behind her in third. UMass' top points scorer was Dan Cady who placed fifth for the second year in a row in the men's A race. Michael Chopchitz, who won the men's B category at UMass' home race last weekend, placed very well despite moving up to a harder category race this weekend. Jeff Brown was able to finish his three lap race once his broken pedal was duct taped back together.

The UMass team travels to Philadelphia on Saturday to race in the UPenn Collegiate Mountain Bike Race. Anyone interested in racing should attend a meeting on Thursday night at 7:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 905 or contact Dan Coady at 256-8175.

In other intramural news, volleyball rosters are still being accepted. There will be a mandatory meeting for captains tonight at 6 p.m. in Boyden 249. Individuals interested in competing should attend a meetings tomorrow as well at 5:30 p.m. in Boyden 249.

Bowden hopes copying Spurrier's style can bring victory over Gators coach

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

AUBURN, Ala. — Other than his father, Auburn coach Terry Bowden can think of no other coach he would rather play — and beat — than Florida's Steve Spurrier.

"It would mean a lot to beat my dad," Bowden said. "I consider him the very best. Next to that, yeah, I'd say it's probably Spurrier."

No. 16 Auburn (5-1, 3-1 SEC) travels to The Swamp on Saturday to face top-ranked Florida (6-0, 4-0). Bowden will be looking for his third win over Spurrier and the Gators in his four years at Auburn. The Tigers are the only SEC team to beat Florida over the last 3 1/2 seasons. Those wins helped Bowden to a perfect season in 1993, his first year at Auburn, and have helped solidify his spot as one of college football's top young coaches. He has a 33-6-1 record with the Tigers.

"That's kind of a mark to shoot for from a coaching standpoint," Bowden said of the wins over Spurrier, who is 67-13-1 in his sixth year at Florida. "It's to go out and beat him because he's gotten to the point where he can beat everybody."

Bowden said he and Spurrier don't have a close relationship because "he doesn't fish and I don't play golf."

But ever since Bowden's arrival at Auburn, he's made no secret of his desire to fashion his offenses after the fast-paced, multiple-formation units employed by Bobby Bowden at Florida State and Spurrier at Florida.

It's part of the reason Bowden has been successful in his head-to-head matchups with Spurrier. In the 36-33 and 38-35 wins — and in a 49-38 loss last year — he wasn't shy about trying to match Florida point for point. It was much different from what many coaches try against the Gators, which is to play ball control, work on field position and hope to be close at the end.

"That usually gets you about a 35-7 loss, or maybe a 28-7 loss," Bowden said. "If I'm going to lose, I'd just as soon it be 50-38 or 50-45."

The wide-open philosophy can make for entertaining football, and it's pretty hard to criticize when it's working. Bowden gets praised for it in games like last week's, when quarterback Dameyune Craig threw for a school record 394 yards in a 49-15 win over Mississippi State.

But it can work against him, too. When the Tigers fell 19-15 to LSU earlier this season, Bowden was criticized for having a wide-open offense that couldn't score points.

He said sticking four wideouts on the field isn't a guarantee a team will be successful — at least not for Auburn.

"I'm still at the point where I have to tinker more — I'm a tinkerer," Bowden said. "Steve's got the personnel where he can just put them out there and have them play their game."

Bowden said he hopes in a few years he'll have the players who can make his system look like Florida's. And he said he isn't ashamed of opening up the offense and trying to be like the best.

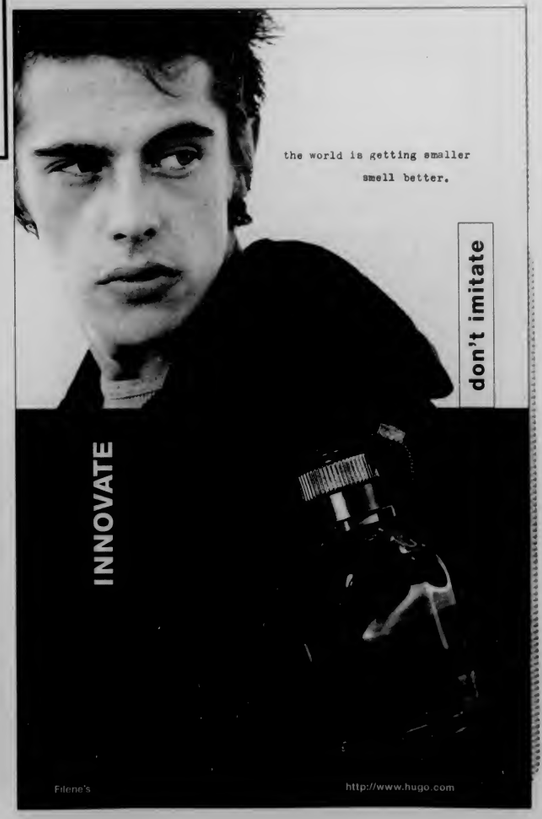
has recorded seven defensive saves, Melanie Gore has three of them.

"I'm pleased with our overall style and execution," Hixon said.

Providence has had a sub-par season thus far. The Lady Friars have yet to score more than three goals in a game and have been outscored 28-18 this year.

The leading scorer for Providence is Erica Herbert with five goals. Heather Koopman and Alissa Wickles have recorded four goals apiece.



Goalie Jaime Soteriades has allowed 18 goals. She has recorded 68 saves and two shutouts. Combined with Andrea Weyl, the two goalies have a goals against average of 2.33 to their opponents 1.58.

"They're usually very tough at home," Hixon said. "I'm expecting a physical contest with some very good play. Providence is similar to Northeastern or Boston University, but with just not as many strong players but still enough to make them dangerous."

preseason match against Brown early on kept him off the field for two weeks. After learning how he fit into his new squad, he then had to rebuild confidence in his fast paced style of play.

"I was scared coming back, to be honest with you. I didn't have much confidence when I came back," Castma said. "I thought the first easy move I would make [my ankle] would snap back out again. My confidence came back game by game."

The first time UMass soccer fans saw the name Castma in the goals scored column was in his return match on the road at Philadelphia against Temple. In the Minutemen's three goal blanking of the Owls, Castma tallied his first and second goals in the maroon and white. What's more, the two goals hit home just four minutes apart.

After the thrashing of Temple, UMass assistant coach Mike Gibbons saw that Castma was beginning to come out of his shell. From then on, he has been a force up front for coach Sam Koch and the Minutemen.

While he may have transferred from a strong club, Castma has no doubts about the strength of his UMass team mates. This weekend, Castma and company prepare for an important road trip in which they will face La Salle (No. 2 A-10) and Fordham, who is tied with UMass for the fourth slot in the conference.

"A lot of guys on the team want to win. We're an incredible team, the talent we have is incredible, but some times, I don't think we want it enough," Castma said. "If we play all 90 minutes like we play the first 45, we'll win.

In fact, Castma does not hold back when speaking of just how far he thinks his team can go.

"I think we can definitely win the A-10s, and from there, I'd love to go to the NCAA Tournament," Castma said. "I've been there twice already, I'd love to see the seniors go on to the NCAA's.

"I feel that if I keep playing the way I have been and keep scoring goals it will be easy to make a name for myself.

Clark said. "I think I'd rather just say that now football is my favorite sport, and in the spring baseball is my favorite sport."

Clark said he has been happy with the way this season is going and enjoys the opportunity to get out there and contribute to the team.

"I told myself at the beginning of the year that I wanted to be a vital part of the offense," Clark said. "I think if this offense keeps up the work that we're doing and keeps showing up every Saturday and performing I think we'll be OK."

Clark is averaging 20.8 yards every time he touches the ball and is an exciting player, especially when the Minutemen run the reverse.

"I think that one thing this offense and the whole team feeds on is big plays," Clark said. "I think every person on the field wants to make a big play, and the more big plays you make the more better the team is going to do. If I keep doing that I think this team is going to thrive on that."

With outstanding hands, speed and ability, Clark has been able to contribute greatly to a team with a much needed presence at the wide receiver, as well as running well with the ball and making some big plays on special teams. He said he wouldn't have it any other way and that UMass was definitely the best choice for him.

"I couldn't have made a better choice, and it has so many opportunities," Clark said. "Athletically it's just outstanding, and the atmosphere that comes on Saturdays is tremendous, the social life you couldn't ask for anything more, you meet such great people and I don't think I could have made a better choice than UMass."

Clark is a 6-foot-2, 188 pound athlete who has determination on the football field, and is a person who feels confident of obtaining the last Yankee Conference title. He is a guy that takes pride in performing and being on the team. Clark said he's the kind of guy that wants to win and is a team player, that loves seeing others do well, and the things out there that make the team win.

Clark is a big plus for this Minutemen squad while having a great attitude and the leadership necessary in just his sophomore season.

"Doug is a special kind of kid because of the athlete that he is," wide receivers and tight end coach Brian Crist said. "I think the biggest thing about Doug is his competitiveness. His leadership and competitiveness rub off on everyone else. He is a big factor, he's not selfish, and he understands what we're trying to do, and that is win."

As for the future, either in football or baseball, Clark is more concerned with what is going on now, and the way this season is going.

"My mom always said take one day at a time, and I think that's all I can do right now," Clark said. "What the future brings for me I'll take in stride, because if you look too far into the future then you forget about the present. So right now I'm going to take one down at a time, and one practice at a time and see what happens."

Clark is doing just that, and while making the plays on the field and adding excitement to the offense, the present is right now a very fun time for Doug Clark.

ries, the last testament that many will leave behind.

"I was born on Dec. 20, 1964," begins Duane Kearns Puryear's brief panel. "I was diagnosed with AIDS on Sept. 7, 1987, at 4:45 p.m. I was 22 years old. Sometimes, it makes me sad. I made this panel for myself. If you are reading it, I am dead."

Nine years have since passed. The Quilt has been nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize. Its story has been made into a film, Common Threads: Stories From The Quilt, the 1989 Academy Award winner for best feature-length documentary. Two books have also been published, A Promise to Remember, a collection of letters to the NAMES Project written by panelmakers, and Always Remember, a retrospective of panels created by and for fashion designers.

The actual panels crafted by fashion designers are instilled and traveling with the thousands of others.

"What's heartening about looking at the quilts of Versace, Armani, Ferre and Joe Boxer, among others, is that, rather than observe something with high ooh-and-aah appeal, what you see is the work of another person who hurts and misses and wishes everything were otherwise. It's unlikely you'll know who their friends were, but you can readily relate to their confusion and helplessness, their wistful attempts at humor and remembrance of good times," said Hal Rubenstein discussing Always Remember in The Advocate.

With the current showing of the Quilt in Washington D.C., it has grown even larger. Accepting submissions during the weekend, the Quilt is expected to exceed the length of 30 football fields, 20 times its size when it was originally shown in 1987.

Last weekend also marked the three week mark before election day.

"We unfold it in our nation's capital in 1996, for the same reason we did in 1987 — to demand that the President and Congress move forward to accelerate research, educate the public and care for the sick," Jones said in this month's issue of POZ.

This weekend's showing was also the last display of the Quilt.

"I don't know what the future holds," said Smith. "I think there is a logical point when the Quilt has to stop growing, and we have to figure out what to do. I know there is going to be that moment when I see the Quilt for as far as I can see, and it's going to tear me apart."

Thomas looks to rush past Simpson

By Bucky Gleason
Associated Press

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. — Thurman Thomas has been trying to catch O.J. Simpson for nine years, only to realize the chase was much more exciting than the trophy.

Thomas needs 66 yards to surpass Simpson as the Buffalo Bills career rushing leader, and he will have a chance of reaching the milestone Sunday against the New York Jets. Simpson will not be on the field at Giants Stadium to congratulate him.

"We're still good friends," Thomas said. "I haven't spoken to him since that period of time, but I know if I do get the record, he'll be there. He won't [actually] be there, but."

But he'll be there in spirit was the unspoken thought.

Thomas has felt like he was chasing a ghost since 1994, when Simpson was charged in the slayings of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman. Simpson has not visited the Bills locker room since, something he had done every season for years while working for NBC.

"I would love to have him there with me breaking the record," Thomas said. "But I know it's not going to happen. I'm sure that whenever I do break it, he'll be aware of it."

Thomas has been steadily creeping up on the records that made Simpson a public figure in the first place. Two years ago, he broke Simpson's record with his sixth season of more than 1,000 yards rushing. Last year, he broke Simpson's mark of 41 career 100-yard rushing games.

Last week, homas established a mark with his 58th rushing touchdown, one more than Simpson. On Sunday, reaching his average of 78 yards per game would bring Thomas to 10,588 yards, 12 more than Simpson.

"He's going to be one of the great ones who ever played the game when he finally does retire," Bills coach Marv Levy said. "He's done it on a team that has been successful, which is very important. He is an extremely tough, smart player. He's done it on a team where other players have accumulated personal statistics."

Thomas has played in 17 more games behind a better offensive line than Simpson had during his nine-year career with the Bills. The 30-year-old Thomas is one of only three running backs who have rushed for 1,000 yards in seven consecutive seasons, and he has nearly doubled Simpson's reception yardage.

Thomas also led the league in yards from scrimmage four straight years. Two team records he probably won't break are yards in a season (2,003) and yards in a game (273), both of which are owned by Simpson.

Thomas also has played on better teams, which helped him even as he led the Bills to four AFC championships to start the 1990s. Simpson was on three winning teams in Buffalo and played in just one playoff game before finishing his career with two unproductive seasons in San Francisco.

Barkley looking at another two years

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Two more years of basketball will be followed by a job at NBC. After that, he'll run for governor of Alabama in 2002.

Charles Barkley now has a life plan. And the newest superstar of the Houston Rockets says it doesn't necessarily include winning an NBA championship.

"Everybody tries to tell me what I'm thinking, but I'm not thinking about winning a championship," Barkley said. "It would be great to win it, don't get me wrong. But I look at things differently than everybody else."

For 12 years, it has been painfully obvious that Barkley indeed does not look at things — or comment on them — like anyone else. Easily the most outspoken of the league's high-profile players, Barkley is currently crusading against young players who don't work as hard or treat the game with as much respect as he.

He says today's NBA shamelessly glorifies and overpays young players who haven't shown much more than the ability to sell sneakers.

"The NBA made all those guys stars so they can sell jerseys and shoes, but most of these guys can't play," Barkley said. "It's sad. We might laugh it off, but seriously it's a shame."

Barkley, acknowledging that his skills have deteriorated, was almost forced into retirement in recent years by a painful back injury. Now he says his back hasn't bothered him in more than a year, and his plan is to play two more years, move to the broadcast booth and then enter politics.

And he's not kidding about running for governor.

"I'm very serious about it," Barkley said, calling current Alabama Gov. Fob James "a clown."

"Politics is on the back burner, but it's something I look forward to," Barkley said. "There's an election two years from now, but I'm not going to be in that one. They'll have to wait six years for me."

It has been almost two months since Barkley got his wish and was traded from the Phoenix Suns. His personality clashed with that of owner Jerry Colangelo, and Barkley eventually defined the dispute in terms of respect.

"Everybody thinks I got traded because I wanted to win a championship, but that's not necessarily true," he said. "I wanted to stand up to the system — and I got what I wanted."

He felt the Suns disrespected him last year, when they started listening to trade offers without first talking to him. When the season ended, Barkley demanded a trade.

"My thinking about getting out of Phoenix was standing up to the man," he said. "They want you to make them a lot of money, and then they want to treat you however they want to.

"Well I think I've earned a certain amount of respect. And I proved my point."

Houston traded Robert Horry, Sam Cassell, Mark Bryant and Chucky Brown to Phoenix in the deal for Barkley, giving the Rockets a team heavy on superstars but short on depth.

A 99-87 loss to the Knicks on Tuesday night dropped Houston's preseason record to 2-1. Starters Brent Price, Kevin Willis and Clyde Drexler missed the game due to injuries.

Barkley will play alongside two other superstars in Hakeem Olajuwon and Drexler on a team that won the championship in 1994 and 1995 but has been overhauled since. Olajuwon is the only remaining member of the 1994 team.

"It's unfortunate that I had to wait this long to get players like this around me," said Barkley, who has never won a championship in his 12 years in the league. "Obviously with me, Clyde and Hakeem, people expect us to have a good team and I expect that.

'Straw' wants to play despite fracture

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Darryl Strawberry does have a fractured toe but says he can play. Kenny Rogers says he is healthy, but he may be dropped from the New York Yankees' World Series roster.

Three days before the start of the Series, Yankees manager Joe Torre still had some major decisions to make.

"I expect to play," Strawberry said yesterday after taking batting practice for the first time since he was hurt in Sunday's AL clincher. "I expect to strap on the uniform and have me some fun, just like I've been doing."

While X-rays didn't reveal a break, team physician Dr. Stuart Hershon said a CAT scan taken yesterday morning showed a 1-to-2 millimeter fracture at the top of Strawberry's right big toe. Strawberry limped slightly as he walked from the Yankees dugout to the outfield to stretch.

"Over the next several days he should improve," Hershon said. "I think we have a good chance he'll be able to play."

Hershon and Torre said they anticipated Strawberry will be able to play in the outfield in Saturday's opener and not be limited to serving as the designated hitter.

Strawberry, who hit three homers against the Orioles last weekend, insisted on taking batting practice.

"I felt good at the batting cage," he said. "I didn't want to lose the groove I was in."

Torre sounded a lot less hopeful about Rogers, hit hard against both Texas and Baltimore. He said Rogers had trouble lifting his arm to the proper release point.

"I have to make a decision on how well he can pitch in his present physical condition," Torre said.

Torre's plan is to pitch Andy Pettitte and David Cone in the first two games, though he hasn't finalized their order. Jimmy Key will pitch Game 3 at Atlanta or St. Louis.

"We'd like to go with four starters," Torre said. "We have some options, even though we'd rather it be Kenny."

Right-hander Ramiro Mendoza, who made 11 starts during the season, could be activated. So could right-hander Dave Pavlas and left-hander Dale Polley, who pitched in relief.

Torre isn't eager to use Rogers in relief.

"We have to decide if Kenny is going to be useful out of the bullpen," Torre said. "I'm doubtful on that only because of the shoulder problems he's had all year."

Rogers, signed last winter to a $20 million, four-year contract, struggled to a 12-8 record with a 4.68 ERA during the regular season. According to Torre, Rogers will tell him he's healthy even when he's not.

"I want the ball whenever they can give it to me," Rogers said.

Clearly, the left-hander would be disappointed if the Yankees take him off the active roster, a decision that must be made at the end of batting practice Saturday.

"Your ultimate goal is always to play in the World Series and win it," Rogers said. "He's going to make his decision. That's fine. That's not my job, to make that decision. I don't disagree with anything they do."

The Campaign for the University of Massachusetts Amherst

Dear Campus Community:

Campaign UMass is a five-year venture to secure the University's future as a premier public institution of higher learning. For the first time in its 133-year history, the campus is undertaking a comprehensive campaign to strengthen its image throughout the Commonwealth, to recruit advocates, and to generate $125 million in crucial funding for key initiatives.

The timing of Campaign UMass coincides with the implementation of a comprehensive plan, three years in the making, called "Strategic Action: Towards a Commonwealth of Learning." The ultimate goal of these two coordinated processes—the comprehensive campaign and strategic action—is to rally all the University's alumni, faculty, students, staff, parents, and friends into a unified force for change. In the process, we aim to transform the entire campus into a more efficient and responsive institution committed as always to teaching, research, and outreach in the service of society.

We invite you to join this campaign with thousands of others in the extended UMass community. Together, we can achieve the ambitious goals of this progressive venture, captured boldly in our Campaign UMass theme of "To Dream, to Act, to Lead."

Yours sincerely,

David K. Scott

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20
Your hard work and perseverance begin to pay off. It may not be as much fun as winning the lottery, but you can be sure that it's deserved. Plan for the future by making a firm commitment and prudent investments.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
You're able to do the work of an army this week, but avoid burnout by keeping your evenings free. Spontaneous activities are the key to relieving stress. A business opportunity holds great promise.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
Even though you may be ahead of schedule on an important project, avoid wasting time in idle conversation. You could make a bad impression on someone you'd rather dazzle. You might also spend your spare time troubleshooting.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
Make a strong case for something you've been wanting, and the odds are good you'll receive it—if you've done your homework. In a partnership, focus on building up the other person's strengths, rather than improving their weaknesses.

LEO
July 23–August 23
Although a recent innovation may be clever, it's probably not the right tool for the job this week. A business luncheon could turn personal. Think ahead before deciding what you want, and then pursue it whole heartedly.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22
Don't allow intense emotions to blind you to the realities of a situation. Get an expert's advice; then, strike out boldly. Avoid stretching yourself too thin.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
If you're looking for more money, start by selling yourself. Could you be packaging some of your skills and talents differently? A spendthrift tempts you to follow suit, but you'd be wiser to keep your spending habits under control.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
Unchanneled energy equals chaos, so before you leap off in a new direction, stand back and make some decisions. A relaxing weekend takes an interesting twist when a friend makes a startling revelation.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
Take aim at a long-term goal and you'll hit your target. Plan on working hard and you won't be disappointed. A daredevil approach to life means some hardships in the near future. Play it safe.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
Although you're a bundle of energy this week, you're not sharp when it comes to communicating. Focus on clarity and you could avoid a serious misunderstanding. Discuss the rules with someone who can change them.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18
A great inspiration could need some further refinement. Delegate some of your responsibility to a group to maximize your effectiveness. What seems like a cruel criticism could have an extremely useful core to it.

PISCES
February 19–March 20
Listen to a wise friend for advice on a personal problem. Simplicity is the key to most decisions this week. Take the high road when dealing with a difficult person. There could be more going on than meets the eye.

Yesterday I was combing my eyebrow on the street when I overheard these old guys talking about"when their number was up..." .....the day you're gonna die.

What if you knew your # was 23 - you'd be dead within the month... or even 15,336?

I'd bet there'd be some wicked wild parties all over the place .... and divorces, and some weddings... and tons of people saying, "I'm sorry..."

and love letters in small envelopes quietly slipped into mailboxes... .....and a lot of kids trying to get their parents to tell then why they did what they did.

And, ofcourse, a few people would buy another dog... but almost nobody'd be painting the house..... or spending an extra hour at the office....

Reasons why we need a new Student Union

10) Impossible to exterminate cheeseburger sized cockroaches that infest building.
9) Abundance of unidentifiable smells nauseates workers in building.
8) Pigeon droppings make for slippery walking surface by main entrance.
7) Funding needed to build a new building would make a great excuse for a tuition hike.
6) Maybe a new, inaccessible location would keep them "Choose or Lose" freaks the hell off our campus.
5) Family of angry weasels has taken over boiler room.
4) What better way to say "I love you" than with a new Student Union?
3) Asbestos! Asbestos! Asbestos!
2) Let's just say that the last building inspection was performed by Bob Dole's dad.
1) It's the only building we have on campus not named after some dead person.

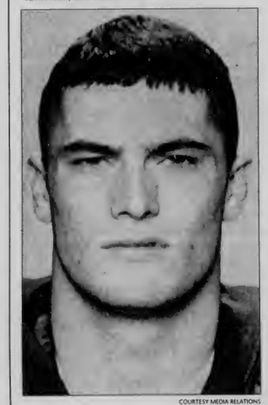
UM's man of all seasons



By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

For a receiver, playing on the University of Massachusetts football team this season is much better than in the past. Just ask sophomore wide receiver Doug Clark, who is one of the reasons why UMass is off to a 4–2 mark, and is completing some passes as opposed to years past.

Clark leads the Minutemen with 10 catches, 247 yards and two touchdowns on the year. In addition, he has been involved with running the ball in numerous reverses, and is a key ingredient on special teams. In addition to football, Clark is a standout on the baseball team (.318, 2 HR, 40 RBI) which went to the NCAA East Regional game last year.

Doug Clark is a busy man.

A local, coming out of Springfield Central High School, Clark was a three sport athlete in football, basketball, and tennis.

"I come from a pretty big family and we always played sports all throughout our years when we were growing up," Clark said. "When I got to high school it was almost a given that I was going to play three sports, and it was something that kept me busy and out of trouble."

Clark had success in all three sports in high school, but mentioned how he was always most interested in the pigskin.

"I had a lot of fun, and the favorite one was always football, because my father had always played football through his life, and I almost wanted to emulate him," Clark said.

In high school Clark was a quarterback, running for 467 yards and 16 TDs, while throwing for eight TDs his senior season on his way to an All–Western Massachusetts selection and earning an award as the most outstanding high school football player in Western Mass.

Coming to UMass, Clark was redshirted his first season as a quarterback, before making the switch to wide receiver, a position he had never played in high school.

"I thought at first I was going to be a quarterback, but after my redshirt year they looked at the wide receiver core and it was very slim," Clark said. "They were looking for somebody that could step in right away and produce at that position, and I wanted to get in and start playing some ball, so I volunteered to step up and prove something at that position, and I think it's worked out well for me so far."

Clark saw action in eight games last season at receiver as well as in special teams. Football was beginning to pick up for Clark as he became a contributor, and so were things on the diamond.

Clark started on the UMass baseball team 52 out of 53 games last year as an outfielder and designated hitter, despite never playing baseball for his high school. He earned second team All–Atlantic 10 Conference honors as a designated hitter, and was also named to the NCAA East Regional All–Tournament team as an outfielder.

"When I came to UMass I never thought I'd be playing baseball," Clark said. "I played baseball as a hobby during the summer, and I wasn't that serious about it. But there came a time that I kind of wanted to test my skills and test myself and compete for a job here at UMass, and it worked out well, and I'm enjoying myself. It's another challenge and a great thing that's happened for me."

It was during the summer after his redshirted season that Clark said that if he had a good season with baseball he wanted to try out for the team. With playing both sports Clark said he doesn't really favor one sport over the other.

"If I said that I love one sport over the other I think there would be a lot of people mad at me,"

Transfer adds to UM offense

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

Do you know how it feels to be the new kid on the block? Trying to fit in with "the group" is not always an easy thing to do, but for the Massachusetts men's soccer team, junior transfer Joenal Castma has fit in just fine, emerging as key offensive force.

The Uniondale, N.Y., native made the trip to Amherst by way of St. John's University where he was third on the squad in scoring in the 1995 campaign with 27 points (11g, 5a). In addition, Castma earned MVP honors, scoring three goals as his squad won the Big East Conference last year.

However, Castma says it was not a matter of playing on the field which led him to UMass, but a combination of a strong soccer program and the school's strong engineering department. Castma had looked at UMass earlier and, in fact, was offered a scholarship to run track, but turned it down to play for his first love as a Red Man.

The decision to leave New York for Amherst was not an easy one. It was not as if Castma was leading a faltering squad that couldn't manage to post a win as last year's St. John's squad wreaked havoc on the Big East and earned a bid into the NCAA tournament for the second consecutive year.

"I decided to transfer right after we won the Big East last year. I felt I could definitely help out the team," Castma said. "UMass has a good soccer program and engineering program as well."

Blowing all "dumb jock" stereotypes out of the water, while Castma battles the rigors of earning an engineering degree in addition to playing Div. I soccer he had to overcome some obstacles along the way.

It was tough to leave a team and conference where opposing defenders knew Castma by name.

"When I was at St. John's people knew who I was," Castma said. "Now I come out here and nobody knows me and out there I was the star of the team. The other day against Duquesne, for example, everybody knew about Mike Butler, nobody knew Joenal."

The Atlantic 10 will know Joenal soon enough as Castma fits in well with the explosive one–two punch of fellow forwards Mike Butler and Dave Siljanovski.

"[Butler and Siljanovski] have incredible speed and decision making skills as well. I can't complain at all, they've been great to play with," he said.

While Castma has fit into the UMass lineup well, it did take some adjusting. While both his present and former clubs have wining traditions, their style of play varied slightly.

"St. Johns tended to play an English style of marking, where here we play a lot of different styles," Castma said. "We have speed up front, but I think that is where I can help out the most.

Currently third on the scoring charts for the Minutemen, Castma got out to a slow start this season, when a sprained ankle suffered in a

Undefeated UM looks for win as men's tennis travels to BC

By Jonathan M. Place
Collegian Correspondent

Twenty–seven years have passed since the Massachusetts men's tennis team has finished the regular season unblemished. Its match today will be held in Boston College at 3 p.m. A win against the Eagles of Chestnut Hill, 2–1 overall, would make the Minutemen 8–0 and a definite contender in the Rolex Championships in the first week of November. These warriors of the pavement are ready for what could be the biggest match of the year.

Sophomore Todd Cheney (No. 1) and freshman Rufino Navarro (No. 4) have been the backbone of the team all year and dominated the courts last week during their match against Vermont, where both led the team with double victories in singles and doubles and secured a 5–2 team win. Their strength will be tested against Christian Frahm (No. 1) and John Brennan (No. 4), of Boston College, who have a combined singles record of 5–3. The doubles team that will be pinned up against Cheney and Navarro is Anand Annigeri and Chris Amundsen, who have a record of 4–2.

Cheney, the team's ace, recorded a perfect 4–0 last week, defeating all of his opponents in both the Vermont and Fairfield contests. Navarro had to sit out against Fairfield with a pulled hamstring, but that did not affect his game against Vermont. Both of these contenders are expected to lead the team today during their match up at Chestnut Hill.

A strong performance is also expected from Alex Aller, the captain of the team, who was also a winner versus Vermont in both singles and doubles. Aller has been the inspiration behind the team's success and has been a consistent factor all year. He will have to face Tim Smith, who is 2–3 overall, as the No. 5 singles match.

Coach Judy Dixon, in just her fourth year as head coach of men's tennis, has led this team to its best season in almost 30 years. Her career record is 35–27 (.565). Nothing would please her more then to see her racqueteers become undefeated after a win against Boston College today, who historically have been trouble for UMass men's tennis. Dixon is hoping to turn the tables and make the Minutemen the dominating force of this rivalry.

Every game, set, and match will be nail–biting as the Minutemen attempt to make history today on the courts of Chestnut Hill. The Eagles of Boston College pose a tough challenge for the Minutemen today — they are 2–1 and just recently demolished New Hampshire 7–0 on the 9th. With both teams coming off of wins, this match looks to be an interesting competition.

The Eagles would love to tear history right out of the hands of the Minutemen, but the men of Amherst likely have other plans in mind.

Buckeyes bash Badgers in Big–10 battle

If last weekend's college football action tells us anything, it's this: the PAC–10 is overrated, the Big–12 is overrated, and Miami might never be where it used to be.

Dig in, it's time for the funk to commence.

Let's start in Miami, where Florida State's double–digit win over the Hurricanes served notice to one indisputable fact. Miami, despite a glittering early season record, is now, alas, a typical Big East program.

That is not a particularly bad thing, but that's not the Hurricanes we grew up with. Butch Davis may have cleaned up some of the mess left by Dennis Erickson, but in turn he's just not getting the super–stud athletes Miami used to get. In the Sunshine State, where Florida and Florida State now rule, recruiting is a war, and that war is being lost by the Hurricanes.

LUKE MEREDITH "College Football"

Now, don't write Miami off as a defunct program. Just realize that the Hurricanes are competing with the likes of Syracuse and Virginia Tech, and not Nebraska and FSU.

• Many people were surprised at the Ohio State–Wisconsin score from this past weekend.

Oh, boy, it looks like I have to explain it again. Look, when you play in a good conference, like the Big–10, you have to show up every week ready to play. Ohio State has looked amazing all year, making us forget that all of the skilled players are first–year starters without any significant experience. They learned this past weekend that you just can't go through the motions in Big–10 games, because the talent is too strong.

But, hey, how 'bout them Badgers? They're not in the AP Top 25, but they should be. After a disappointing year last season, the Badgers look like they might be building on their 1994 Rose Bowl success. Head coach Barry Alvarez is the man, and don't be surprised if he's coaching on Sunday in a few years.

• Come on, ride the train, and ride it up...

I have my early Heisman candidate. It might seem a little generic, but I have to go with Danny Wuerffel. He's been the catalyst for the best team in America, and he's put up the numbers.

A lot of you are saying, Luke, baby, what about Iowa State stat machine Troy Davis? I know he had eight million yards in only five games, but in those five games the Cyclones are 2–3.

Maybe I'm from a prejudiced school of thought concerning the Heisman, but you have to be the main guy on a winning team in my book to take it home. Although this year's Heisman race may resemble the Gino Torretta fiasco in 1991, Wuerffel is the front–runner.

• Lonely and dreaming of the West Coast...

Arizona State impressed a lot of people with its win over UCLA on Saturday. I'm still not convinced.

I know, I know, the Sun Devils were down 28–7 and came back to win, and Jake Plummer's touchdown on a halfback option was sweet. But the fact is that the Sun Devils are the only team in the PAC–10 in the Top 20.

Washington showed just how far the conference has fallen by getting squashed by a Notre Dame team that really isn't that good, and both USC and UCLA have devastating non– conference losses to Big–10 schools. As for the rest of the conference, besides Washington St., there might be no other bowl bids. If they're not careful, they might be next schwag status very soon.

• Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

Much maligned, much disputed, much booty. You can't stop the schwag, you can only hope to contain it. This week the schwag heads south, way down to the Lone Star state, where we find an overrated Texas squad.

A pre–season Top 10 squad, the Horns find themselves out of the Top 25 after a dreadful loss to Oklahoma at the Cotton Bowl. The Sooners used to be good, but before Saturday they had lost seven straight games dating back to last season. The Horns were among the biggest programs in the country during the Eisenhower administration, but much like iceboxes, Ford Fairlanes and the AFL, their time has passed. Not even the QB with the best name in college football, James Brown, can save this pitiful Austin atrocity of a football team.

Texas was highly ranked early on because of two things. One, they're in the Big 12 now, and the pre–season hype concerning this new conference was overwhelming. Two, they're Texas, and the Horns still have a decent reputation in the polls. That's done now, but it could be worse. They could be Texas A&M.

The University of Massachusetts men's crew won its second straight regatta last Sunday at the Head of the Connecticut Regatta in Middletown. The lightweight eight handily defeated the nine boat field, clearing second place Dowling University by over 15 seconds. The heavy weight eight was edged out by Wesleyan University to finish second in its division. The open eight, largely underweight, held its own and finished in the top third. The men's crew will travel to Boston this Sunday to compete in rowing's largest single day event, the Head of the Charles Regatta. UMass will be testing its speed against some of the fastest crews in the world.

UMass on the road again as field hockey visits PC

By Casey Kane & Jen Ryder

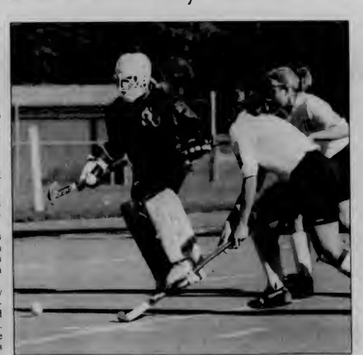
Despite the fact that the Massachusetts field hockey team is experiencing its first losing streak of the season, the Minutewomen are not in a slump.

After dropping both of last weekend's games, the Minutewomen will look to reverse their recent losing trend when they face a pair of opponents over the next three days.

The Minutewomen (9–4, 3–0 Atlantic 10) have five games left in the season, four of which are on the road. First up for the team will be Providence College (5–7, 2–2 Big East) today at 3:30 p.m. in Providence, R.I. UMass and La Salle will square off on Saturday at 1 p.m.

"We're really focusing on ourselves, trying to do the best we can every time we step out there," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Our focus is how we are going to put the ball in the net."

After producing offensive explosion of seven goals against West Chester on Oct. 6, UMass has failed to score in the past two games being blanked by Syracuse and Boston University. But the Minutewomen have not been without opportunities.



In both of last weekend's contests UMass dominated the game but couldn't put its shots away.

"All of us, even the players, have played this game long enough to know that once in a while you run into a dry spell," Hixon said. "We just can't worry about it or let it upset us."

Sophomore Erica Johnston leads the team with 10 goals and a pair of assists. Senior Kyle Rothenberger, whose 59 shots lead the team, is second in goals with six. She also has five assists.

Also contributing to the UMass offensive effort is freshman Saskia Fuchs, whose balanced play has resulted in five goals and seven assists.

The defense has not shown any signs of weakening. Senior goaltender Hilary Rose has only allowed two goals in those two losses. Overall Rose has 135 saves while allowing 15 goals. Massachusetts

Clinton told to refuse Sary entry to States

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia (AP) — A U.S. congressman has urged President Clinton to refuse entry to the United States to a former Khmer Rouge leader recently pardoned by the Cambodian government.

Ieng Sary was one of the top leaders of the genocidal Khmer Rouge regime of the 1970s, but he was pardoned recently to clinch a peace deal with Khmer Rouge rebels.

Rep. Benjamin Gilman, (R-N.Y.), said the United States should send a message to the Cambodian government that "the lessons of history will not be repeated, and that perpetrators of genocide, as mandated in the Immigration and Nationality Act, will be denied visas."

In a letter to Clinton dated Oct. 15, Gilman wrote that "The genocide perpetrated by Mr. Sary and his close collaborators... was in part a result of the apathy of the international community."

Driver cross-examined in police manslaughter

PITTSBURGH (AP) — Defense attorneys yesterday questioned the memory of a tow truck driver who testified that he saw a white policeman start a fight that left a black motorist dead after a traffic stop. Frank Belajac, 33, is the only eyewitness to come forward in the death of Jonny Gammage besides the officers that subdued him.

He testified Wednesday and Thursday at the trial of two white police officers accused of involuntary manslaughter in Gammage's death last year.

Belajac said one officer started the fight and was joined by other policemen who kicked, hit and clubbed Gammage as he lay on the pavement.

"I noticed that they were hitting on him," said Belajac, who's white. "It looked like one was on his back hitting him on his back."

The testimony directly contradicts the version offered by five suburban police officers who stopped Gammage on Oct. 12, 1995.

But Belajac said today he "wasn't paying attention" when he arrived on the scene after hearing a report of the traffic stop on a police scanner.

Gala dinner kicks off Campaign UMass

Private donations will help students to dream, act & lead

COURTNEY SMITH / COLLEGIAN

Athletic Director Robert Markum, Chancellor Scott, University President William Bulger and Chair of UMass Board of Trustees Robert Karam greet one another at yesterday evening's Campaign UMass dinner reception.

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is part one of a two–part series featuring the Campaign UMass Kick Off Gala Dinner and the Campaign Initiatives. Part two will feature the significant contributions made to Campaign UMass as well as administrative and student reactions to the beginning of this comprehensive campaign.

Campaign UMass, which is a comprehensive campaign to raise $125 million in funds for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst over the next five years, officially began last night at the Campaign Gala Kick Off Dinner which took place on the floor of the Mullins Center.

Over 500 UMass Alumni and friends of the University attended the dinner, which included a feature presentation by the Billy Taylor Trio. Addresses were given by Chancellor David K. Scott, President William Bulger, Alumni Association President Michael Morris as well as several other administrators.

Vice Chancellor for University Advancement Royster Hedgepath, whom Scott called the "architect" of Campaign UMass summed up the night by saying, "Tonight has been a wonderful launch for Campaign UMass. The Alumni Association and friends of the University who have given principle gifts have set the stage for the very significant acquisitions yet to come."

Campaign Addresses

The evening was lead by the Master of Ceremonies, Professor Julius Lester.

In his opening address, Lester said, "I hope you realize that this evening is a wedding feast of sorts. It marks a new kind of marriage between UMass and many new private and public sources of support."

In the introduction of Chancellor Scott, Lester said, "Soon after Chancellor Scott arrived on campus, he and more than 200 capable students, faculty and staff began working on the Strategic Action Plan that is transforming this University into an instrument for gauging the future."

Lester added, "Now he is presiding over one of the most crucial events in the 133 year history of the campus: Campaign UMass."

In his opening remarks, Chancellor Scott said, "I have done a lot of thinking about 'the vision thing.' In my experience, vision is nothing more than the ability to see the obvious before it smacks you in the face. What's obvious to me is that UMass is on the move and worthy of our support."

Scott recognized several people present at the dinner who have been influential to the University, including, Chair of the UMass Board of Trustees Robert Karam, Student Trustee Sean Carter, Bulger, President of the Faculty Senate John Bracey, Student Government Association (SGA) President Maurice Caston, Graduate Student Senate (GSS) President Deepika Marya, former Chancellor Richard O'Brien and State Representatives Stephen Kulik, Pat Landers, Ben Swan, Joseph Wagner and Hal Lane.

According to Scott a major benefit of the Campaign is the "Blueprint for Progress" created by the combination of Campaign UMass and the Chancellor's Strategic Action Plan.

"These changes blueprinted in the plan will, we believe, allow us to secure UMass as one of 20 universities in the country which are both landgrant schools and members of the American Association of Universities (AAU)," Scott said.

The three specific goals of Campaign UMass, according to Scott are: 1) Raising $125 million in private funding; 2) Enrolling 3,000

Chancellor's budget cuts threat Stonewall Center programming

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

The future of several Stonewall Center programs are in jeopardy because of funding cuts from the Chancellor and Dean of Student's Offices, said Felice Yeskel, director of the Stonewall Center.

According to Yeskel, the Stonewall Center may not be able to continue sponsoring cultural and social events if funds are not restored.

The center, for now, will continue to educate and support the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (GLBT) community at UMass, however.

Threatened programs include activities such as the weekly brown bag lecture series and monthly poetry readings.

"It would be an incredible loss for students," said Donnie Roberts, who serves on the Stonewall Center support committee. "The whole campus would lose and it would be a shame if everything went down the drain."

According to Mark Baszak, a member of the Chancellor David K. Scott's Task Force for GLBT issues, his office has funded the brown bag series with $10,000 a year for the past three years. That funding has now been cut.

Baszak said that funds from the Dean of Student's Office was also denied this year; which, in the past, were as large as $8,000.

"Now the Stonewall Center is short at least $18,000," said Baszak.

Yeskel said that Scott told the center last year that his office would no longer fund the brown bag series and advise them to look for resources elsewhere.

The Dean of Students' Office also told the center last year that funding would be cut short.

Tom Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs, however, seemed unaware of these cuts.

"I'm not quite sure when the reduction came," Robinson said. "It had not been reduced to my knowledge."

According to Yeskel, the center was able to secure a one– time grant of $7,500 from the Student Affairs Office. This money came from emergency funds.

Yeskel said that the administration emphasized that this funding would not be repeated annually.

"This money covers the fall semester, so we're okay for now," Yeskel said. "But it creates problems for the spring semester for the variety of programs."

According to Marcellette Williams, associate chancellor, the Scott's office was never supposed to fund the program in the first place.

Williams said that the Stonewall Center fell under the "line responsibility" of Robinson and that base funding should be sought through these channels, rather than looking to Scott for support.

The reason that the center received any funding from Scott, according to Williams, was to the GLB Task Force created by then Chancellor Richard O'Brien in 1992, which was provided with "a one–time funding."

When Scott came into office in 1993, he continued to give money to the brown bag series, Williams said.

"In the spring of 1994, in a meeting with the GLB, Felice Yeskel was preparing to go on sabbatical and she asked the chancellor directly for $10,000 for the upcoming year of '95," said Williams, who attended that conference. "In that meeting, we agreed to fund a transition year and not a base funding of that brown bag series."

Williams said the administration was simply trying to offer the center a financial buffer zone while they established other fund raising means. The funding, she said, was never intended to be permanent.

"He [Scott] gave them over a year to find alternative funding which was never part of the base budget to begin with," Williams said.

To address the problem, Scott has devised a campaign to increase the base budget so that these financial problems can be avoided in the future. Yeskel said.

According to Yeskel, this base budget currently covers the necessities like employee wages, library expenses and office needs. The money is not enough to fund the extra programs, he said.

Center supporters have campaigned to raise the base budget by $20,000 by encouraging students to mail, call and e–mail demand for this increase to the administration.

Williams, who has already received a large number of e– mails, said that she feels it is "necessary that they be able to continue to provide the useful services."

However, Williams said that the center's supporters are concentrating their efforts in the wrong place.

Robinson went as far to say that enough funding already exists for the center and said his office had increased the base budget for fiscal year 1993 by $18,500 and another $26,400 was added to the base budget in 1995.

Robinson said that he knew that there was a fund raising campaign in progress, but he was unsure as to what it was about.

The center is in the process of looking towards alternative channels for program funding, but Yeskel is very doubtful that they will be successful enough to cover the costs without help from the university. If this is the case, the threatened programs will be discontinued for next year, he said.

Purdue counselor shot by freshman over drugs

By JR Ross
Associated Press

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. — A Purdue University freshman facing drug charges fatally shot the dorm counselor who reported him to police, then locked himself in his bedroom and killed himself, authorities said.

Police found Jarrod Allan Eskew, 18, dead after storming his room with tear gas Wednesday. Jay Severson, a 27-year-old graduate, was killed with a shotgun blast.

Severson, a supervisor in the men's dormitory housing mostly freshmen, found Eskew smoking cocaine in a dorm room Tuesday and told police, said Severson's father, Donald.

"He was just doing his job," the elder Severson told The Indianapolis Star.

Police searched Eskew's room and car and found cocaine, Purdue spokeswoman Jeanne Norberg said. Eskew had not been arrested, but knew police had impounded his car, she said.

A shotgun-wielding Eskew entered Severson's third-floor room, fired a single shot, then ran down the hall into his room and later shot himself, said officials at the 35,000-student university, about an hour's drive from Indianapolis.

"I just heard a big, loud blast. And then I heard what sounded like something dropping," said freshman Kevin France, who lives a floor above Eskew's room. "It was so loud, I could feel the floor shaking."

Eskew had been a good student and played football at Crawfordsville High School in his hometown, said his coach, Rick Schavietello.

"He was a happy kid," Schavietello said. "He had a good family life. He seemed like he had a good relationship with his stepfather. He had a loving mother."

Severson, of Fair Oaks, had just returned to school to become a sports trainer or coach, his father said. He also had just proposed to his girlfriend and set a wedding date of June 14.

The Five College Program in Peace And World Security Studies held a lecture last night at Amherst College titled "Russia in Crisis: Yeltsin and the Future of Democratization."

The lecture was held in Converse Hall and included a panel of three professors from Mount Holyoke College, the University of Massachusetts and Amherst College.

Pavel Machala of Amherst College acted as moderator for the evening, introducing the panel of three and presenting questions throughout the lecture. He began the evening by addressing the confusion that everyone feels about Russian issues.

"Years ago I thought I could predict the future of Russia. Now I know no more than the New York Times," Machala said.

Karl Ryavec, a political science professor at UMass, led the panel by addressing the nature of the "crisis" that Russia is facing.

"Russia is facing a long drawn out crisis. My view is that the present state of movement is slow. The transition, because of its long history, will take decades," Rayavec said.

According to Rayavec, Russia will not revert to socialism as some skeptics believe. But many problems remain in the process of change.

"Russia is trying to make an unworkable system work," Rayavec said. "In Russia, there remains dissatisfaction, disillusionment, and anger over the current state.

"The U.S. cannot and can't try to mold Russia. Uncharacteristic calm and patience is needed by the U.S.," Rayavec said.

Stephen Jones, of Mount Holyoke College, continued the lecture by outlining Russia's current foreign policy, and its relationships with the three Caucases: Azerbaijan, Georgia and Armenia. According to Jones, oil, the flow of oil and ethnic conflicts are issues that cloud the area of the three Caucuses.

Jones explained that Russia has been trying to turn the Caspian Sea into an inland lake so that it can retain the abundance of oil that lies on the sea floor. But the newly independent Azerbaijan is claiming parts of the Caspian as its own. To counteract this move, Russia has been assisting Armenia in an on going war with Azerbaijan, providing logistical and military support, hoping to disable the new democratic state.

"Russia has also been behind coup attempts in Azerbaijan," Jones said.

Russia has remained active assuring that the flow of oil goes through its hands rather than Turkey's, by closing borders in Azerbaijan and insuring the flow of oil west.

"Russia has heavy handed involvement in ethnic conflicts, trying to keep the Caucuses within its sphere of influence, and keep them unstable," Jones said.

According to Jones, the U.S. wants to insure the independence of the Caucuses (keeping Russia relatively unpowerful), guarantee the export of oil and limit the export of illegal arms. But, Jones feels that the U.S. has been too quiet and for the wrong reasons.

"There is a strong anti-Islamic power and Armenian alliance in Congress," Jones added.

Jeff Sedgwick, a political science professor at UMass, brought the lecture to a close by relating his previous experiences in Russia with the other two speakers viewpoints.

Sedgwick illustrated how difficult it is for Americans to comprehend or understand the situation in Russia.

"In the U.S. there was a viable state government before there was a federal government. In Russia, it is the opposite," Sedgwick said.

Sedgwick compared Moscow to how Chicago looked in the 1920's.

"The city is wide open and the mob is everywhere. Wherever there is money there is a guy with a machine gun," Sedgwick said. "Moscow was not prepared for the influx of cars. When they went to a free market system everyone bought cars. Now there are traffic jams everywhere."

The views of the Russian people seemed quite different than what Americans think, according to Sedgwick.

"The crisis is an American fixation, there is not a sense of urgency in the Russian people. They seem wonderfully oblivious to the things the U.S. worry about," Sedgwick said.

advocates; and 3) Strengthening the campus image.

Scott said, "I like to use the acronym AIR to remember these goals. AIR stands for Advocacy, Image and Resources. But in this case, it is a breath of fresh air, not hot air."

Scott ended by stating the Campaign UMass slogan, "To Dream, To Act, To Lead."

"All of the people at UMass dream, act and lead. And that's the over-arching goal of Strategic Action and UMass," Scott said.

Karam addressed the audience, stating, "What I want to tell you tonight is that your campaign stretches far beyond the boundaries of the flagship campus here in Amherst. In many ways, your campus is sailing ahead of the rest of the fleet in a daring, pace-setting, forerunning position. Your campus is venturing into unchartered waters for public education in our state."

Morris spoke next, "There is genius in the achievement and spirit of the UMass students. Tonight we want to do an extraordinary thing."

Morris announced that over the next five years, the Alumni Association will contribute a $1 million gift dedicated to the creation of an Alumni Center at UMass.

"Our gift for the Alumni Center will make this great University even better," said Morris.

Bulger informed the crowd that Governor William Weld has recently signed a document which assures the UMass system (Amherst, Dartmouth, Boston, Lowell, Worcester) $217 million from the state which funds approximately half of the $437 million UMass Capitol Campaign.

"I think this marks that first time in the Commonwealth that the sate government has agreed to match funds with a public institution," Bulger said.

Bulger ended by saying, "People love this place [UMass Amherst]. I believe that they will seize upon Campaign UMass."

Deputy Chancellor Marcy Williams communicated a message from Weld to the audience.

Williams said that Weld said, "May we always have courage to dare, care, demand and dream at the University of Massachusetts."

Campaign Initiatives

The financial objective of Campaign UMass — to raise $125 million — will support the following priorities:

- $40 million for faculty support to enable the University to attract and retain the best and brightest professors.
- $40 million for college-based initiatives and research to support the programs, research and technology that each college requires to function effectively and creatively.
- $10 million for students to help fund financial aid and merit scholarships.
- $30 million for facilities that could include several of the following: a life sciences building, an engineering building, a center for the visual arts, an addition to the School of Management, an Alumni center, and an addition to the renovation of the Student Union Building.

Lebed fired in Kremlin upheaval

By Sergei Shargorodsky
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin fired security chief Alexander Lebed yesterday, one day after the popular and ambitious former general was accused by a political rival of building his own rogue army in an attempt to seize power.

The firing — the latest Kremlin upheaval since the ailing Yeltsin has been away preparing for heart surgery — choked off, at least for now, Lebed's growing influence.

But it clearly has not stemmed the political aspirations of a man whose quest for power has led his detractors, including the prime minister, to accuse him of having a "Napoleon complex."

In an interview after his ouster was announced, Lebed told the Interfax news agency that he would "get some sleep" and then begin to "prepare for possible presidential elections."

Lebed blamed his ouster on Yeltsin's chief of staff, Anatoly Chubais, saying: "I was very much in his way," Interfax reported.

One of Russia's most well-liked leaders because of his strong law-and-order platform, Lebed's endorsement helped Yeltsin win the presidential election in July. Lebed's signing of a peace accord in Chechnya in August boosted his popularity among ordinary Russians, but met with harsh resistance in Moscow from politicians who accused him of selling out the Russian army.

Yeltsin — scowling but looking somewhat healthier than other recent appearances — announced the firing today on national television. He immediately signed a presidential decree removing Lebed from his official duties, saying that Lebed's behavior was damaging to the country.

"I can't tolerate the situation any more," Yeltsin said, speaking slowly but clearly, his slightly gravelly voice tinged with anger, his eyes narrowed and his hands clenched. "I have to relieve General Lebed of his position as secretary of the security council."

Debate secures Clinton's poll lead

By Mike Mokrzycki
Associated Press

NEW YORK — About half of the voters who watched Wednesday night's presidential debate said President Clinton won over rival Bob Dole, according to three quick polls.

In an ABC News telephone survey, 56 percent said Clinton won the town hall-style confrontation, which was the final scheduled debate, and 27 percent said Dole did better, while 14 percent rated it a tie.

A CBS poll got similar results: 54 percent thought Clinton beat out Dole, 26 percent thought Dole did better and 11 percent called it a tie.

In a survey taken by CNN, 59 percent said Clinton did a better job in the San Diego debate and 29 percent picked Dole.

The margins of error for each of the three post-debate polls ranged from plus or minus 4-to-5 percentage points.

In results from pre-debate polls varied widely on whether the presidential race was tightening.

In a CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll, Clinton was supported by 48 percent, Dole 39 percent and the Reform Party's Ross Perot by 5 percent in the rolling average of results from separate national samples Monday and Tuesday nights. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Gallup found Clinton slipping from a peak of 57 percent and Dole improving slightly from 34 percent in the middle of last week.

Last week Dole and Clinton were roughly tied when voters were asked which candidate would provide the best moral leadership for the country; now Dole leads by 14 points on that measure. Dole also has gained as the candidate who can be trusted to keep his promises.

While those results suggest Dole's new attacks on Clinton's ethics may have started eroding the president's advantage, an ABC tracking poll the same two nights as Gallup's found a stable race.

What's up with disposable friendships?

Kristi Fournier

It's trendy, it's hip: disposable friendship.

"Back in my day, shoes were only a nickel... when I was a youngin' I woke up every morning at 3 a.m. to feed all the farm animals... Quit your complaining. I remember walking four miles to school in 10 feet of snow."

That's my dad for you. He's a firm believer in the past. His past, that is. Not only did everyone work harder and everything cost less, but people were nicer. So here's one for me: "Back in the day, a friend was forever and people had a lot more compassion."

Nowadays, a friend just isn't worth what it used to be. I was raised the old-fashioned way, I guess.

Good friends are hard to find. Needless to say, when a fellow human being and I muck our way through several messy, emotional situations throughout the course of months and months, I assume a very presumptuous idea. I consider this fellow humanitarian to be my friend. Couldn't very well call this person my enemy, but as it turns out...

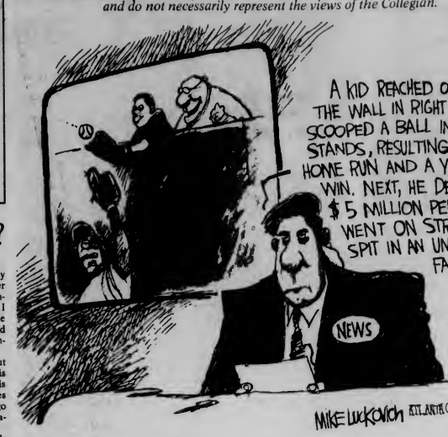
In the past year, this alarming trend of disposable friendship has touched my life first–hand. Looking back with 20/20 hindsight, I realize that my old–fashioned upbringing made me naive, but I still feel free to toss the bulk of the blame on my good old former friends.

You may or may not know the type. You meet a new person. You and this new person share laughs and food. The two of you ride out the petty problems of life. Months pass and you guys are by no means strangers. In fact, by your definition, you are friends. After all, you've leant your ear and comforting shoulder to your new friend more than once, proving that you are a willing sounding board and a trustworthy human being. And then, silly, foolish you, you put your trust and faith into your bud. You assume that everything you gave so selflessly will come back to you with equality. At this point the harsh reality of a current, but very alarming trend hits you. When your emotional thermostat is on zero, your friend can not be bothered with offering or supplying you with some genuine concern or cheer. Well, folks, there is a name for people such as these: fair–weather friends.

Perhaps I sound bitter. Maybe I sound scorned. Could be that I am projecting a slanted view based on my own personal bad experiences. Well, let me be the first to admit that I am all of these things and more. I am appalled at society's lack of appreciation for the fine art of friendship. Sadly, this once sacred institution seems to lay in ruins. While my mother told me that you can never have too many friends, it equally as important to remember that you are never too good to be someone's friend. I have found a handful of other people who hold these ideals close to their hearts. But I have been scorned and spit upon by another handful who have appointed themselves judge and jury.

This trend of disposable friendship concerns me; but more than anything it makes me damn mad. To me, it is an indication of humanity falling by the wayside. There is a serious dysfunction of our society when it becomes acceptable and common for friends to go their separate ways for unaccountable reasons.

Picture this scenario: a group of friends part for the summer only to reunite several months later in the same place. But this is not a reunion of friends. It is a reunion of people who once were friends, but now are strangers who can barely even exchange greetings. This isn't your classic case of drifting apart. This is another fine example of society's newest trend: disposable friendship.



Where I come from, friends are forever. Albeit in a realistic sense, friends do drift apart and go their separate ways, but those sentimental feelings of affection and nostalgia never completely fade. And certainly, if two distanced friends' paths were to one day cross by chance, they would exchange a lot more than casual greetings. There would be an unspoken remorse for the lost laughs, the forgotten memories and the irretrievable moments of joy.

In life, it is inevitable that friends will grow apart. But friendship is an aspect of life that is definitely worth fighting for. It should not be abandoned unless it is absolutely necessary. And, in my opinion, that is hardly the case. If you can find enough reason to spend months upon months with a friend and if you share emotional triumphs and pitfalls, how can you later find it within yourself to abandon that person and cut them out of your life? I guess I need to get with the times and stop being so sentimental. But, I can't. I still remember all the good times with my forgotten friends and I wish the trend of disposable friends would disappear, because it is a very distressing sign of the times. And I can't help but yearn for the good old days where shoes were a nickel and friends were worth their weight in gold.

The age of ignorance

Chris Stamm

Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with sleep.
— William Shakespeare, The Tempest

While sitting in class the other day, my professor read these lines aloud, and in a flash, confirmed an idea I have been mulling over for quite some time. If I may be permitted to paraphrase: the day will come when each of us will make our final exit, and when that day comes, that's it. Anything we have now will be gone and it won't matter. I know, a morbid thought, but I think the Old Bard hit the nail on the head. If people would just understand this fact the world will be a better place.

Let me explain.

I have this theory that stupid people are taking over the world, and the largest cause of this influx of stupidity is the fact that people get too wrapped up in what is happening on a day to day basis. This may be a stretch, but if you open your eyes every once in a while, you'll see what I mean.

For example, how many of you have you seen your life flash before your eyes driving down the highway? Last weekend, when I was driving back to school I was moving right along when I saw a pair of tail lights coming in my direction. It turns out that the driver, who by some miracle had a driver's license and enough money to buy a $30,000 Acura, missed his exit. Instead of getting off at the next one and then getting back on the highway, he figured he would just pop it into reverse into oncoming traffic (namely me).

What was so important that this guy had to get off the highway as quickly as possible? Maybe, in two little jars in his back seat, he had both the cures for cancer and AIDS, and he needed to get off the highway ASAP in order to save the world.

OK, probably not, but even so, I would rather have not swerved across three lanes of traffic risking life and limb to return to school.

This is not an isolated case. Last Saturday I was at the grocery store, a grave mistake in suburban America where the local Stop & Shop is the weekly meeting place for half the town. After battling the crowd, I picked up the few things I needed and got in line. I'll stop right here because you know where this is going.

The old guy behind me erupted when he saw that I had nine items in the eight items or less line. He obviously fell asleep during his English 330 class, because if he read his Shakespeare, he would know without a shadow of a doubt that in the end, it won't matter. I seriously doubt that neither he nor I will be on our deathbeds thinking, "If I only put the extra bag of chips back..."

Critics say that with the miracles of modern society, people are forced to do things as fast as possible. We want next–day mail, fast food and pay–per view television. I don't buy it. Granted, things like e–mail and the World Wide Web have made it easy for us to access all sorts of things with a click of a mouse, but the world as a whole isn't that way and people don't really expect everything to be that way.

People are just dumb. Have you watched "Geraldo" lately?

How many times have you turned on the tube to see a daytime talk show featuring a family of devil worshipping, punk rock transvestites that support Bob Dole?

The bottom line is, people just need to relax and stop thinking that everything that happens is a life or death situation. We have to realize that there are some things that we can't control.

A turn or two I'll walk to still my beating mind.

A house, never a home

Liana Melinnis

The other day my roommate and I were eating lunch and we were on the subject of my family, and I guess she was wondering what exactly had gone wrong between my parents. I've always said this, and I'll say it again, I'm not much of a politician, nor a feminist, but I am opinionated and quite emotional.

Each lesson I learn in life, each difficult task I face, I feel it is my duty to share with as many people as possible. So when she inquired about my family, and how I got through the rough years at such a young and tender age, I tried to tell her our story. But the years of pain we'd experienced had somehow become repressed memories in my mind. It was not until I rummaged through some of my writings and found a story I'd written a year and a half ago, a story that explains my past, perfectly.

For as long as I can remember, I've always had a house, a cold, dim building where I ate and slept. The living room was furnished with dark wood and gray upholstery. There wasn't much light, as the curtains were usually drawn, and never can I remember smelling fresh autumn air through the bow windows. My father occupied this room for what seemed like forever and I would retire to my bedroom, the only place in the house that was bright and young. But eventually it became a prison cell; there was no place else to go, nowhere else to hide, and I began to resent this room, like all the others.

The only sounds that came from the living room were television and yelling. Every day there was a bitter argument between my parents, and I sat in my cell, wishing my life away. It is not easy for a child to listen to her own father diminish and outright destroy her mother, the person she loved most in the world. Over and over he (I sometimes refrain from calling him father) would verbally abuse my mother, and tell her she'd be better off "gone".

There I was, trying my hardest to be the happy, bright girl that everyone wanted me to be. Instead, I was living a life of fear and, at times, sheer terror. I never knew how he would act when I returned from school each day, whether there would be a bottle of liquor on the counter or just a diet Sprite. I walked on egg shells. It was wrong to laugh at the dinner table, it was "abnormal" to go out on the weekends. it was a pure sin to talk to boys on the phone. I was never good enough for my father; being me was simply not enough, and this is when I wondered whether life was worth the effort.

I was so unhappy, as was my older sister, but our real pain was the result of our mother's. Inside, I could never understand why she never left him, or divorced him, or even fought back. My strong, independent mother let him do this to her, to us, and I never could comprehend why. The living room was a battleground where my father inflicted numerous wounds on the people I loved, wounds that would drive them away to never return back.

On May 21, 1994, my greatest wish was granted, and after years of abuse, my father moved out. Only through my beloved grandfather's death was my mother able to gain the strength to file for divorce and take her life and ours back. I learned that she had blamed herself all these years, as many abused women do; she felt like a failure, and although this divorce was the beginning of a new life, it meant she was unsuccessful in providing the life she'd always dreamed her children would have.

Verbal abuse has never been given the concern and attention it deserves. Physical abuse has always been cited as "worse." But it is not until a person goes through it that verbal abuse is seen for the heinous crime that it is. The scars on the outside will heal, but the ones on the inside cannot be medicated or bandaged. The scars on the inside remain with a person every day, and all it takes is one small slip for the wounds to reopen.

As for myself, I live each day to its absolute fullest, whether I am sitting in lecture, listening to music with my boyfriend, or taking a nap on our living room couch. It has been a hard, uphill battle for my mother, sister and me, but today when we look in the mirror, we actually like what we see. We have slowly reclaimed our pride and confidence, and you know what? We are three of the greatest women in the world. Why? Because we have learned to seize the moment, we smile in our sleep, we laugh in our dreams, and that is the way it was always supposed to be.

The first thing we did when my father moved out was redecorate the living room. It glows in colors of pink, blue, peach, and yellow; the lamps are big and bright and illuminate the room like fireworks on the Fourth of July. We even moved the couch under the window and for the first time I can remember, the summer breeze played with my hair while I listened to music or slept or simply enjoyed the golden silence.

These days the living room is my favorite room in the whole house, and I have never felt so free and at peace with the world around me. Today I have a house that I enjoy coming home to, as it is filled with divine laughter. I lived my entire life in a house, but I never had a home; that is, until now.

If you know me, then you know how much I value my family, although small, my mother and sister are all I've had throughout my life, and all I will ever need. Being far from home is bittersweet for me. I miss the little things that mean so much, my couch, and my kitchen table. However, nothing in this world can compare to the joy and excitement I feel when I hop on a Peter Pan bus headed to New York, home.

As for my father and I, we have established a civil relationship, and although he tries, by my own choice, he is not a big part of my life. He regrets the past, and often wishes he could change it, but, strangely, I don't. I have all the family I need, and although it was rough getting to where we are, I wouldn't change a thing.

Firm up those ads

Tara MK Connelly

It is with little wonder that Americans seem to be obsessed with their bodies. Ever since the '80s when Olivia Newton John told people to get physical, health and exercise seems to be the new American past–time. Now all you see is ads for Nordictrac, ABflex and Health Riders. People in spandex and perfectly sculpted pecs, lats and quads flash by in a dizzying array of rippling sweat soaked appendages, all aimed at convincing you that money, fame, fortune and love can all be had in just 20 minutes a day for 14 weeks.

Here are a few of my favorite commercials created solely for my amusement:

1. The Nordictrack Ab thingy. I don't know what the hell it's called because I don't really care or intend to buy it; but for some reason Nordictrack decided to replace real life users with laid off porno stars. You've seen it: a man and woman look out their studio apartment window at night. Rain falls, neon lights glint off the windows they look pensive. It must be time to exercise.

Soon that cheesy wank wank music starts and the woman, wearing what is supposed to be an exercise suit (string bikini bottom and super small tank top, uh huh), begins to "work out." The camera pans to her chest, her butt, everything is oiled up and for some reason the woman also likes to get fit in a dim, yet seductively lit room. The same scenario applies for the man except they tend to speed up the music a bit. Thank the good Lord that he doesn't have to speak in the commercial because his spandex are on so tight that he could probably sing soprano in this year's upcoming Christmas pageant.

2. Bally Fitness. The first time I saw this commercial it was during their "easy in, easy out deal" for people who only have time to work out for 20 minutes a day. Music was pumping, beautiful bodies flashed by, the camera cut from one heaving chest to another — I thought it was a Madonna video. But no, this fast paced promo was supposed to make me envy these hard bodies, wish I was buff and to call the 1–800 number. Don't breathe, don't pause, pick up the phone, throw on your spandex and rush, rush I say! to the nearest Bally. I think I yawned and took a nice nap.

3. That Bow flex thing. Here is the deal. You get on a bench that has bendy pieces of stuff attached to it which you pull and tug at to give you a tighter everything. It's supposed to build resistance, force you to grunt and sweat and feel good about yourself. These people working out are feeling good, good because you're stupid enough to slap down your Master Card and pay their salary. So you can do 20 odd exercises on it — the way those models are twisting and turning, you have to be a contortion artist to get in those positions. The last time I used a bow was in gym in high school. We were forced to try out archery and someone almost lost their eye.

4. The Ab roller. My brother actually bought one of these things and I used it — once. I felt the burn, and I also felt nauseous from cramping my abs together. They have on the commercial this place called something like Club Ab. It's basically a studio rigged up to look like a tropical paradise — instead it looks like Barbie's tropical dream cabana. They have this dumb ass back–drop that in no way, shape or form could convince even the most imaginative person that they were looking out at sea. There is fake sand, fake cabanas and oh look! Here we are, honey, at this beautiful tropical resort and aren't we lucky to have stumbled upon these Ab rollers set up on platforms near the pool? This vacation is going to be super! Yeah, super sucky just like this commercial.

5. That Jenny Craig commercial that shows this poor woman degrading herself. First we see her being pinned against her kitchen counter. At her feet is a snarling yapping bichon or some useless piece of fluff. While trying to subdue the hot tempered beast, the woman calls Jenny Craig telling whoever the hell answered the phone that she will be right over because her little precius–weasil doesn't recognize her. The only reason I can think of a dog that small getting pissed off by that woman is if the woman, in her desperate need to eat, fell upon the dog's dish and ate its Kibbles 'n' Bits. And if that was the scenario — sick'em Precious!

Now don't get me wrong, exercising is a good thing. I'd do it more if it wasn't such a task, but lately I feel as if I'm being shamed into it, that anything jiggling should be immediately flatted, toned and oiled for display. First it's the abs, then thighs, then the butt and soon you're frantically leafing through a magazine looking for that plastic thing to firm the corners of your mouth. It's addictive, counting calories, protein, carbs and vitamins. Soon you want 6 percent body fat, you're measuring your thighs for muscle mass and begin arranging your social life around your work out schedule. Beware because sometimes exercise can be hazardous to your brain.

Understanding women 101

Seema Gangatirkar

The other day, a male friend and I were having a conversation about the differences between men and women. At one point, my friends said, "You girls may think men are weird, but we think you are nuts."

As a woman, I feel myself particularly qualified to offer men some advice on how to deal with women. So, pull your chairs up and listen carefully to this public service announcement. I'm about to reveal to you everything you've ever wanted to know about women.

First things first. Women always go to the bathroom in groups. This baffles men. After all, you'd never catch a man asking another man if he wanted to go to the bathroom. It's just not done — probably out of some masculine ego trip or something. Women, on the other hand, have no qualms about asking a girlfriend to voyage to the loo.

The bathroom thing is most prevalent and traumatizing at the senior prom, when girls in crinkly, poofy dresses make a beeline for the ladies' room, without a second glance at their dates, who at this point are squirming uncomfortably in their tuxes. Not to make you paranoid or anything, guys, but if you suspect that your date is discussing you with her friends, it's probably true. The reason for this is obvious.

Women love to talk. They discuss and analyze every little nuance of every conversation or gesture. You see, it matters to us just how that "hello" was said or what he really meant when he said "I'll call you later." In this day and age, you really can't take anything at face value — which is why women feel the need to beat the proverbial dead horse.

And guys, there is such thing as PMS. Some men think that women use PMS as a reason to be irrational, irritable, weepy and emotional.

That's not true. Women can be all of the above any time of the month, but they possess the ability and the right to be especially delirious, demented and disturbed at a certain time of month. What it all comes down to is, men just don't understand.

And when women tell you that you don't understand, no translation is needed. Basically, they are telling you that something is wrong and it's up to you to figure it out. It's sure to drive you absolutely crazy, but you probably know by now that women are not particularly straight–forward about anything. While guys are thinking linearly, our thoughts are doing a 360. So guys... take a guess, because if we let you know what's going on, it means that you just don't understand. Hint: it's probably some secret option that would never occur to you. The best thing to do is to ask another woman what the deal is. After that you're on your own.

As for those women who make it hard for you to figure out if they are interested in just being friends or more, just be smart about it.

If a woman calls you every night and talks for several hours when she ought to be writing that 500–page paper on sub–Saharan Africa, it's a pretty good indication she likes you — more than just friends that is. Either that, or she's perfected the gift of gab and no one else will listen to her. In that case, you might as well cut your losses and disconnect the line right away.

When it comes to dating, it seems like the nice guys are left out in the cold and all the jerks have the dates. Well, the truth is women aren't particularly attracted to jerks, but jerks just tend to be more out there than the nice guys. They're the ones that go after the women, the ones who score the dates. But fake comfort men, relationships with jerks never last long. And pretty soon, women are back out there, looking for the nice guy.

And when women talk commitment, don't get scared and think they are talking marriage. Women don't necessarily mean commitment with a capital "C," but rather they want to be adored, doted upon, flattered and pampered every minute of the day — that and a dozen roses every day or you're history. So if you keep your lips firmly to ground she walks on, you've understood the "C" word well.

In a nutshell, those are the basics on how to communicate with a woman. It's going to be tough, but in the long run, we're quite easy to understand... most of the time, that is.

The way of intimidation

Raghuram Vadarevu

One late afternoon, a short, straight–haired, somewhat rounded woman reveals herself from behind a curtain in a New York City studio. She walks out onto a stage with chairs arranged in a row. She is greeted by a rousing standing ovation from the star–struck audience.

"Wow, I'm on television," they think not realizing that their 15 minutes of fame are slowly evaporating.

After a short commercial break, we return to a scene of crazed audience, members beckoning the proverbial sacrificial lamb to show herself from behind the curtain. The lamb bares herself and sits down on one of the chairs, ready to be judged.

"My name is Mary. I am 16 years old. I have an 11 month–old baby and I want to have another one soon," she says, bracing herself for the impending barrage of caustic remarks.

"Let's get some audience reaction," says the trying–everything–to–look–polite host.

"Well, I think that you don't have any business becoming pregnant. I mean for God's sake, you're only 16," a furious audience member shouts from the front row.

"I think that you should get a life. Where was your mother or father when you were growing up, anyway? It's all of their fault, if you ask me," adds another frustrated audience member whose comments were met with cheers from the audience.

Acting in defense like a wounded animal, Mary begins sending harsh remarks back at the audience for criticizing her parents.

"My parents had nothing to do with my decision," Mary pleads. "They've been good parents to me." All this to no avail. The audience, unwavering, does not want to hear her story.

She suddenly falls silent, not knowing what to say and afraid of the reaction that her words may bring.

This situation is typical of what unfolds everyday on the sets of television talk shows. The talk show circuit mirrors society in which people are embarrassed and scolded into silence. Mary is symbolic of the people in this society who face judgment everyday and the audience is symbolic of the ever–present judge and jury mentality that will try and convict anyone without making any attempt to understand and accept the differences of the judged.

Consequently, this situation results in a society that is intimidated into silence in fear of having their beliefs ripped apart by the judgmental hollers of others. Those who judge and intimidate are often happy when they shout down others. This comes from their socialized insecurity and their need to feel more worthy and more intelligent than the next person. They feel less competent so in order to level the playing field, they resort to intimidation.

Intimidation and judgment are also techniques used by people in power to silence and run away from the "common people." This is evident in government. About 40 years ago, a senator from Wisconsin named Joseph McCarthy led what was called a communist witch hunt. He used intimidation and scare tactics to create an environment of fear. In effect, he silenced everyone who disagreed with him. The only government officials who were immune to McCarthy's attacks were people who had more power and influence than he did.

Intimidation is also used in today's political campaigns in which candidates smear the image of their opponent to stay in or gain power. The candidate who wins the battle of the insults will have successfully silenced his opponent. Someone once said that society mimics the actions of its leaders. If this true, than the vast majority of the public use the same intimidation techniques as politicians to establish a superficial superiority that stifles authentic communication.

These and many other factors result in a society that is subordinate to the wishes and whims of the few select people in power who have mastered the art of intimidation. The more one explores the role and the misuses of intimidation in our society, one will realize its similarity to George Orwell's 1984 in which a society of voiceless people live in fear of an oppressive entity known as "Big Brother." We will soon come to see that the society Orwell described is what we know as the United States–1996.

A new love

Amy Lounsbury

I have never really believed in love at first sight. This summer I met a boy who changed my mind. He has the cutest dimples, the softest hands to hold, and the widest, most infectious smile. The world becomes a brighter place when he enters the room.

No, I did not meet the man of my dreams this summer. I became an aunt. I will never forget the first time I saw my nephew's face, all red and scrunched up, but still the most beautiful face I had ever seen. The moment I saw him I began to cry. The tears were pouring down my face. I wasn't exactly sure why I was crying, but I couldn't stop. To this day I cannot believe that my big brother, the one who teased me for all those years about my sense of style, the one who will never miss an opportunity to pull a fast one on me, the one who has always been the clown of the family, now has a son of his own.

As I held this baby for the first time, I suddenly understood my parents' motive for everything they do. I don't ever want to see anything hurt this child, or to have anyone see him for something other than what he is — an angel. I don't know what he will look like when he is older, what his interests will be, or how his personality will develop. All I know is that none of this matters. There is nothing he could say or do that would make me love him any less. This is only the love between a nephew and his aunt. I am sure this is a mere fraction of the love between a parent and child.

Becoming an aunt has given me a new sense of responsibility. Now that one of my siblings has become a parent, it is time for us to prepare for a whole new generation. We are no longer the kids in the family. It was inevitable. We are rapidly approaching "the other side."

I think about my aunts, whom I have looked up to all of my life, and realize that I am one of them now. It really is a wonderful position to be in. I hope that I am able to share a little of myself with my nephew. I want to teach him about always looking on the bright side of things, about the joys of Christmas and the wonder of that first snowfall. I want to teach him what I have learned, to always follow your heart no matter where it may lead you. I want to tell him about growing up with his dad and what his mom was like when I first met her.

This is the first baby that I have known that is so closely related to me. The passage of time is a truly amazing and wonderful thing. I have seen my brother grow from a child to a father himself. His son will only know him as "Dad," but I know the whole story. Nearly three decades of his life passed before he became a parent. I am fortunate to have witnessed most of them. This must mean that my parents had lives before their three children were born. It's hard for me to imagine them as anything but parents, but yes, there was life before me.

This is what is so special about family. Time ticks away year after year, but stories are passed down from generation to generation. Half of the people around the Thanksgiving table may not have even been born "the year the table fell down," but they have heard the story so many times that they actually believe they were there. They love to recount the tale and laugh as if they had witnessed it firsthand.

The way traditions are passed on is amazing. As an aunt, I will do my best to make sure nothing is forgotten, that no story goes untold. It is fascinating to think that our family could go on forever. I want to make sure the stories and traditions live on as well. With a close–knit family, this is bound to happen.

This brings me back to my original point regarding love at first sight. To see an infant is to see the beginning of a whole new lifetime, one filled with ups and downs, happiness and heartaches. But one thing is certain about my nephew's life. It will be filled with nothing but love; a love that can never be broken no matter what he does, a comforting love that will tell him he always has a place to go, the kind of love that makes all of the problems in this world disappear just a little bit.

Sex offender laws miss the point

Suzanne Barber

When Megan was 7 years old, her favorite color was pink and she loved to ride bikes with her big brother, Jeremy. Her dad called her "sweetheart" and she loved animals. Like most 7–year–olds, she had no reason to distrust a neighbor, and she went into his house when he offered to show her a puppy.

Megan was playing in her driveway on July 29, 1994 when she stopped to talk to her neighbor, Jesse Timmendenquas. She didn't know that he had been convicted twice for sexual assault in Middlesex County in the early '80s. She even didn't even know what sexual assault was — no 7–year–old should. Timmendenquas lured the trusting little girl into his house where he raped her and strangled her to death with a belt.

A newly enacted law in Massachusetts requires sex offenders convicted within the past 15 years to register with their local police department by Oct. 1. This August, Masssachusetts became the last state in the country to enact Megan's Law, nicknamed for Megan Kanka, the 7–year–old girl who was brutally raped and murdered by her neighbor in Hamilton Township, NJ.

Lawmakers have misdirected efforts to warn communities about sex offenders. Megan's Law, while helpful to an existing problem, wouldn't be necessary if sexual predators were punished more appropriately for their crimes. Rapists and pedophiles should not be released from prison at all.

Attempting to fathom why these atrocities are committed in the first place is impossible. Almost as inconceivable is criminal justice system's setting offenders free to rape again. Why do they get a second chance? Their innocent victims got a life sentence imprisoned by physical, psychological and emotional pain.

Police encourage voluntary registration and threaten fines or prison terms for those who do not register by the October deadline. Those on parole or on probation for sex crimes are automatically entered into the registry by the state. Only 1,100 out of the 10,000 convicted sex offenders in Massachusetts have registered by the deadline. It is hard to believe a little thing like not registering would weigh heavily on the conscience of someone capable of raping a child. Why are there even 10,000 known sex offenders walking around?

The American Civil Liberties Union is actively fighting the law arguing that it violates the convict's constitutional right to privacy. Do sexual predators deserve privacy? Privacy is a human right. These convicts are not human.

Megan still believed in Santa Claus when she was murdered and would probably have a hard time believing her neighbor would hurt her, even if the Sex Offender Registry told her so. A registry listing bad guys isn't going to break the unconditional trust of a child.

Maureen Kanka wonders everyday if her daughter's brutal murder could have been prevented... if the neighborhood had known of Jesse Timmendenquas' past. If he never got out of prison after his conviction on two sexual assaults in 1981 and 1982, he never would have gotten a second chance and Megan would still be alive.

We shouldn't show compassion for people who have assumed the ultimate power over another human being. They don't deserve the compassion they seek when trying to rebuild their lives after prison. They didn't show compassion for their victims when they plead for mercy. They got off on it.

The new law still confounds those who are supposed to enforce it. The legal jargon and paper–work required to get the information on our friendly neighborhood sex offenders out–weighs the potential good that could come from such a registry. In the meantime, the logistics of the law is the smoke–screen for the bad guys to get away with something worse than murder: They slaughtered a young child's spirit and continued with their lives thinking they still deserved human rights. Why should these low–lives get a second chance?

Megan didn't.

Letters to the Editor

Graduate bill clarification

To the editor:

I read Thursday's Collegian article regarding graduate student bills and the waiver process for the supplemental health fee with concern. There are many misrepresentations and issues in the article which I would like to clarify.

First, it should be made clear that GEO members will receive a waiver of the supplemental health fee and will receive the amount owed them in excess financial aid checks, although for some members it may require two checks. But first, it is required that the student report that they are GEO members and provide information concerning outside health coverage. The billing instructions directed students to note GEO membership on the back of the bill and return it with an outside health coverage form if relevant. This is the process which was successfully used in the fall of 1994. The health coverage information is important so that the health costs billed to the academic departments which employ graduate students will not rise again next year. When departments pay more for this health coverage, they have less funding available for other pressing needs.

On Sept. 23, Susan Pearson met with Patrick Crowley and Nancy Deprosse from the GEO to explain and discuss this billing process and to provide an opportunity for questions and concerns. I am told none were raised.

The process puts an extra burden on the staff in the Bursar's office, however, they are still working to accommodate the needs of graduate students. This process worked in the fall of 1994. We hope it can work again.

Seeing the other side

To the editor:

What's with this avalanche of attacks and slanders against the Editor of the Multicultural Affairs page? It's shameful enough coming from UMass students. But when a faculty member, an English professor, joins the chorus I refuse to remain silent.

When I opened the Collegian to the Multicultural Affairs page on Sept. 30, I was overjoyed to see that the editor had chosen to print the story of the day by daughter of Palestinian men, women and children by Israeli troops as reported by the Al Akhbar News Service. I was overjoyed because I knew that by doing so Collegian readers would, at the very least, be provided with "the other side of the story" — that the Israeli side, which is slavishly parroted by the mainstream media, would be challenged by the Arab side, and the reader would consequently be nearer the truth of that horror.

And, what is the truth? Between 76–80 Palestinians were killed, including at least 46 civilians, 16 children and 17 Palestinian police. Some 1,600 Palestinians were injured seriously enough to require hospital treatment. The Palestinian Human Rights Committee reports that 45% of the dead were shot in the head and 25% were shot in the chest, proving that the Israeli troops were shooting to kill, not to quell a demonstration. Put these figures beside 14 Israeli soldiers killed and it should be clear the Palestinian police fired in self–defense, of themselves and of those they are duty–bound to protect — everywhere a justifiable response to armed violence gone mad — except apparently on the West Bank and in Gaza.

I have lived and worked as a journalist in the Middle East for most of the last 30 years. I know the American people are seldom provided with unbiased, complete, truthful reports of events in the Middle East. When I returned to the States after a 12–year continual absence I was appalled at the ignorance and at the misinformation and misconceptions common everyone on the Middle East, even among my peers in academia.

For instance: How does the term "Zionist soldiers," or even "Zionist occupiers," used in the Al Akhbar report deny the state of Israel the right to exist? What's wrong with the term "Zionist?" My Concise Oxford Dictionary defines Zionism as: "Movement founded in 1897 that sought and achieved the reestablishment of a Jewish nation in Palestine." What's wrong with "occupiers?" How does Professor Silver characterize the relationship between the Israeli army and the Palestinian people living in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip?

Such sentiments as these that have filled the Collegian recently, give rise to, encourage and validate the distortions of history and truth that characterized Matthew Wurtzel's column on Oct. 7, and make possible his supreme arrogance in asserting that "...we (Jews) are God's chosen people." If I were an Arab confronted by a people who believed themselves to be "the chosen of God," I would take up arms in defense as well, knowing with certainty that God would be on my side.

Molitor poor excuse for columnist

To the editor:

As a member of the media, I can certainly respect Erik Molitor's right to freedom of speech. I rely on that right to stress my points and ideas every week. But, at the same time, he has a responsibility to the Collegian and its readers to not misinterpret those rights.

"As flaming as a raging bonfire." Why is that terminology necessary? Because Mr. Molitor had nothing intelligent to say about the issue. He has become one of the few conservative voices of the Collegian's editorial page, but it seems that the only purpose of his poor excuse for columns is to stir up controversy and to incite reactions.

Mr. Molitor's ridiculous metaphor was not the only reason this latest column was ludicrous and unnecessary. His hypocrisy on top of his ambiguous, pointless argument was an abomination to journalism.

Erik Molitor: you are a homophobe; a weak, scared, unintelligent homophobe. Any "man" who is uncomfortable hugging a "friend" for too long is a person who needs to look himself in the mirror and be embarrassed.

Paul Maloof
Webster

To the editor:

I am not writing to protest the opinions Erik Molitor expresses in "My Own View" (Oct. 16). I disagree with many of his statements, but since he seems to respect my ideas, I will respect his. In fact, I agree with Mr. Molitor that a world in which everyone has been conditioned to "think, believe, and act the same way" would be dreadfully boring.

However, this blatant notion of mutual respect is often what is missing from many debates on all sorts of social issues. I appreciate your point, Mr. Molitor, that an anti–gay sentiment "does not give anyone the right to persecute," but I would like to emphasize it a bit. People often use their own, personal opinions, religious or otherwise, to justify denying gays the right to marry, the right to hold hands in public, and even the right to walk down the street free of threat of physical violence.

You and others may be "disgusted" by gays and whatever it is you may believe we do, but the fact of the matter is that we have a right to exist and live our lives in a healthy and safe environment. An undercurrent of mutual respect is essential to these ends, but unfortunately is often absent. Even in a government that claims to support equality for all citizens, gays are treated as sub–human.

I would like to make one additional point about your editorial, Mr. Molitor. You say that one of your closest friends is gay. Well, that's very nice for you. I take exception, however, to your seemingly innocent description of him as being "as flaming as a raging bonfire." If you were writing on race and were describing a friend, would you use a racial epithet? Probably not, because those types of terms are recognized as being insulting and inappropriate.

Most gays consider it equally insulting to hear words like "flame," "faggot," and "dyke" used by straights, even if used lightly or with good intentions. In fact, common, thoughtless phrases like "that's so queer" and "that's so gay," referring to substandard items are quite often offensive as well. I bring up this issue to point out that just because gays can use terms like these doesn't mean that they are open for use by the rest of the population. They are on equal footing with any other racial, religious, or nationality–related insult. I encourage you and the rest of the campus community to think a little more carefully about the words you use.

Davis kisses acting career goodnight in new film

By Adam Levine
Collegian Correspondent

THE LONG KISS GOODNIGHT
Directed by Renny Harlin with Geena Davis, Samuel L. Jackson
Playing at Mt. Farms Theater

The Long Kiss Goodnight is one of the most stylish action films to hit the screen in quite some time. The problem with this movie, despite its slick exterior, all director Renny Harlin did was remake his previous Die Hard films and replace the hero with a heroine.

The film begins with Charlie Baltimore (Geena Davis), narrating the story's premise by explaining how she is an amnesia victim with no memory of her life prior to eight years ago. She is the mother of a young girl and lives a wholesome life in a quiet suburban town. By reasons she cannot explain, she is suddenly attacked by an escaped convict in her home and in an attempt to protect herself she suddenly realizes her extreme combat abilities.

Samuel L. Jackson plays Baltimore's hired private detective assigned to investigate her case. After her murder attempt, the two set out on the trail to discover the hidden secrets of Baltimore's mysterious life. Eventually she realizes she was previously a C.I.A. assassin betrayed by her commanding officers and now marked for death.

The Long Kiss Goodnight contains all the same basic cliches we have come to expect from an action thriller film. It is equipped with witty one-liners and an exciting but predictable plot that leaves the audience entertained but far from breathless. The film rarely contains any dull scenes, but as a result suffers from a lack of character and plot motivation. Harlin is foremost concerned with constructing well-polished action sequences that although appear cool, are far from unique. It is however, refreshing to see that as we approach a new millennium, Hollywood is allowing women to blow up bridges and achieve murder counts in the hundreds just as well as any man could.

The narrative moves at an extremely fast pace in an attempt to keep up with the film's violent nature. This does not allow the viewer to understand or sympathize with any of the characters' actions. At one point, Baltimore is about to kill her young daughter because she is a hindrance to her resurrected secret agent life. With no explanation, Baltimore decides to spare the girl and devotes the rest of the film to protecting her from the corrupt agents trying to kill her.

Once again Jackson has proved himself one of the most talented character actors in Hollywood. His humor and intensity is charming and enjoyable to watch. Although he arguably may be labeled as typecasted, his performances are always genuine. Davis, on the other hand, starts the film well, playing her usual role as both naive and innocent, but her reformation into a super assassin is far to unrealistic.

The Last Kiss Goodnight is a fine action film, but this genre has become far too over-played. Excessive violence is no viable substitute for lack of substance plots when other filmmakers have proved they can intertwine both aspects successfully. C-

Robert Frost trail superb for season

"Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
And sorry I could not travel them both
And be one traveler, long I stood
And looked down the one as far as I could
To where it bent in the undergrowth..."
—Robert Frost

Follow the words of Robert Frost and travel down a narrow winding road in the red, orange and yellow woods of the Pioneer Valley. Let your mind run wild over rocky streams, releasing mid-term tensions on the Robert Frost Trail.

In one grand route the Robert Frost Trail links together many of Amherst's conservation areas. Marked by orange trail blazes, the Robert Frost 33-mile route runs along the scenic high points of Mt. Orient, Pulpit Hill, Long Mountain and Rattlesnake Knob.

Alfresco News with Liz Anderson

The Holyoke Range section of the Robert Frost Trail totals around 22 miles. It is one of the five longest foot trails in Massachusetts. The trail crosses parts of seven towns and is located on a mixture of state land, private easements and town conservation and watershed land.

The Notch Visitors Center of the Holyoke Range State Park, just north of the Amherst-Gamby line on Rt. 116, is a good place to start the Robert Frost Trail. From the Notch Visitors Center the trail travels over Rattlesnake Knob covering a series of ups and downs over slippery traprock cobbles to the summit of Long Mountain.

Rattlesnake Knob is an infrequently visited but dramatic point along the eastern portion of the Holyoke Range. Three separate ledges along the Knob allow views north to Mt. Toby, east to the Pelham Hills and south to the deep valley between the Knob and Long Mountain. Further to the east, the old fire tower on the Long Mountain summit is a significant hawk-watching point with a 360-degree exposure and a good vista back westerly to Mt. Norwottuck, the Connecticut River Valley and Mt. Tom.

From the fire tower the Robert Frost Trail continues over the eastern summit of Long Mountain and descends steeply through dense patches of hemlock to Harris Mountain Road.

Sunday's concert remembers music of the Holocaust

By Sarah Kimmel
Collegian Staff

The University Chamber Choir and the Jewish Community of Amherst Chorus, Mahkela, will perform in Bowker Auditorium this Sunday at 3 p.m. in a concert in remembrance of the Jewish music of the Holocaust.

Following the performance, Joshua R. Jacobson, professor of music and director of choral activities at Northeastern University and adjunct professor of Jewish Music at Hebrew College will conduct a lecture on how music provided strength in this time of great despair and trouble.

"The works produced by those [Jewish] composers are a demonstration of the power of music. They serve as a challenge — a challenge for us to remember and emulate the courage of those who continued to sing even in the face of their own destruction," Jacobson said.

Director E. Wayne Abercrombie will lead the University of Massachusetts Chamber Choir in the singing of music that was composed and sung in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp, Mahkela, the Jewish Community of Amherst Chorus, is under the direction of Kayla Werlin. The two groups will remember the tragedy of the Holocaust in the form of song. Together, they will perform music that was written by Jews across Europe. Included in the repertoire will be pieces composed by Jews living in the ghettos and those hiding from the Nazis in the woods.

Jacobson will discuss the censoring of the music that the Nazis considered "degenerate." A rare film clip from a concentration camp will show some of the actual music that inmates composed and performed during World War II. The concentration camp in question, Terezin, was a stopping ground for Jews on their way to the death camps in Poland. Terezin eventually became a showplace, where Jews would perform concerts before deportation to Auschwitz and other death camps. Using the film as context, Jacobson will discuss music acting as an outlet.

"For Jews trapped in Nazi-occupied Europe, music represented a spiritual escape from their physical pain as well as a means of expressing the anguish of their situation... Music can, in some cases, be the only means through which human beings can maintain and express their humanity," Jacobson said.

The program is sponsored by the UMass Department of Music and Dance, the Jewish Community of Amherst and UMass Hillel. The concert will begin at 3 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Donations to offset the cost of the event will be requested. For additional information, please call the UMass Department of Music and Dance at 545-0018.

WFCR hosts Vintage Vinyl sale

By Mike Mannix
Collegian Correspondent

Looking to update your '80s heavy metal collection? Can't find that great jazz album that has been eluding you for years? Need a good reason to dust off the old turntable and give it a spin? Head on down to the Amherst Town Common this weekend for WFCR's (88.5 FM) Vintage Vinyl sale.

In an age where vinyl has been replaced by shiny discs of metal, the area's only public radio station prepares to sell thousands of used records, plus compact discs and cassettes. Proceeds of all sales benefit WFCR which, according to sale coordinator Chris Daly, "is the only local radio outlet where classical and jazz music can be heard along with news and information."

As a public radio station, WFCR relies heavily upon donations.

"The record sale is important because we can't survive without the support of listeners," Daly said.

A majority of the records for sale originate from WFCR's own archives. The remaining amount have been contributions from listeners all across the area.

Over the past six years, the bulk of the musical donations have been on vinyl but every year finds an increasing number of compact discs and cassettes for sale.

Since early September, volunteers have been alphabetizing and categorizing the mammoth collection. Most of the selection falls into the rock and classical genres but Daly said that you can expect to see anything from "cocktail lounge to Broadway hits, Christmas, spoken word and children's records."

Vintage Vinyl began as a simple used record sale but has quickly expanded into a celebrated event that attracts people from all over New England and New York.

Daly said that the attendees range from "the avid collector looking for a particular disc to the simply curious who may be just running errands on Pleasant Street."

In the past, records have sold for $2 and compacts discs for $4. Last year's sale raised over $40,000 for WFCR. Those numbers prove that vinyl may not be dead. According to Daly, many people still prefer "the warmer sounds you get on a piece of vinyl."

So whether you're searching for that Iron Maiden gatefold album or the traditional sounds of Gene Krupa, you're sure to find something for your musical collection this weekend at the Vintage Vinyl extravaganza.

Vintage Vinyl takes place on Saturday and Sunday 10 a.m. – 5 p.m. on the Amherst Town Commons. Admission is free. Call (800) 639-8850 for more information.

New Earth Crisis loses hardcore edge

Keepin' it real with Adam Dlugacz

Congratulations to H2O for signing a two record deal with Epitath Records. Look for their new album next summer. H2O is playing Nov. 6 in Providence with the Descendents and the Bouncing Souls.

• Norm Arenas of Anti Zine and Texas Is The Reason fame released a compilation called Anti on Another Planet Records. The album features unreleased songs by Quicksand, Gameface, Outspoken, Supertouch, 108, Threadbare, Snapcase, Chamberlin, Garden Variety, Undertow, Strife, Sensefield, Lifetime, Mouthpiece and a live track from CIV.

The compilation offers an excellent cross-section of modern hardcore and the songs, for the most part, represent the best these bands have to offer. The only disappointing thing is that like Norm's zine, most of these bands have broken up.

• The Promise Ring released their debut EP 30 Everywhere on Jade Tree Records. Although their pop meets Sunny Day Real Estate leans to the whimpier side of things, this album brings a smile to my face every time I hear it.

COURTESY WARNER BROS. RECORDS
Sense Field

• Lifetime released a new two song 7-itch on Jade Tree Records. The songs are "The Boy's No Good" and "Somewhere in the Swamps of Jersey".

• Fahrenheit 451 is releasing their debut EP on Striving For Togetherness Records. The five songs are "Settle," "Shift," "Blind," "For" and "Afraid." "Settle" and "Shift" were re-mastered from their incredible demo. Fahrenheit 451's blend of Burn and 311 shows how hardcore bands can progress from the traditional role without playing metal.

• Long Island's Vision of Disorder have their debut LP on Roadrunner Records coming out this week.

• Honkeyball, Reason Enough and Blood For Blood are playing the Butterfield basement on Saturday night. California's Sensefield are opening up for the Mighty Mighty Bosstones at Pearl Street in November. In Boston on Nov. 5, the Descendents are playing with the Swingin Utters and the Bouncing Souls. Also look for Snapcase and Earth Crisis shows in Boston in November.

• Well the new Earth Crisis is out on Victory Records and not surprisingly, it sounds like their last album — only a little more metal. To tell you the truth, I may not agree with their militant stance on straight edge and veganism, I find it quite immature and moronic as well as exclusive. Do we really need two albums of the same exact thing? Furthermore I thought hardcore was about being open- minded, accepting of others and trying to be different. Wearing baggy jeans, listening to the same music, chanting along to threats to drug dealers that you are never going to carry out does not make you revolutionary.

Sounds to me like Earth Crisis has found a formula for success and are sticking to it because they know it sells records. I wonder how hardcore that is?

Jazz royalty takes throne at FAC

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The Queen of Jazz will hold court at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tomorrow night. Vocalist Cleo Laine and her husband, musician John Dankworth, will open up the FAC's 1996-97 season with an evening of pop and jazz music, starting at 8 p.m.

Laine and Dankworth, who wed in 1958 when Laine was a singer with the Johnny Dankworth Big Band, have made waves throughout the jazz world, both together and sometimes solo. Together, the couple boasts impeccable credentials and an array of prestigious awards and nominations.

Laine began her career in the early '50s in her native England. She didn't make her debut in the United States until 1972. Of the 1972 debut in New York City, John Wilson of The New York Times raved, "The British... have been hiding one of their national treasures."

Since then, Laine has toured major cities in the United States and has made appearances around the world. Laine has appeared in musical theater productions including Stephen Sondheim's A Little Night Music and The Merry Widow. She was nominated for a Tony for her performance in the Broadway hit, The Mystery of Edwin Drood. In addition, Laine is also the only singer to ever receive Grammy nominations in the Female Jazz, Popular and Classical categories.

Dankworth, who juggles the baton, clarinet and saxophone with ease, was born in London and at the age of 17, he entered the Royal Academy of Music. From 1949 to 1955, he was named Musician of the Year by The Melody Maker Jazz Poll, making him the only jazz artist to receive such a high level of recognition.

Dankworth has also made his mark on many of the world's Symphony Orchestras, including the Pops Music Directorship for the London Symphony. Not only has Dankworth been honored the past two years at the British Jazz Awards, but the musical score he composed for Return from the Ashes was nominated for an Academy Award.

Tickets for tomorrow night's performance are $30, $25, $15 and $10 for children under age 17. Five College students are $5. For more information or directions, 545- 2511 or (800) 999-UMAS.

The Harris Mountain Road is an attractive meandering woods walk at the eastern end of the Holyoke Range. It rambles down a lightly trafficked country road to the edge of the Lawerence Swamp.

While hiking over the rugged terrain of the Robert Frost Trail, one can witness an array of wildlife habitat and fabulous views of the Pioneer Valley. The Robert Frost Trail also crosses over various streams throughout Amherst such as Eastmann Brook, Cushman Brook, Adams Brook, Heatherstone Brook, Amethyst Brook, Harkness Brook, Baby Carriage and Hop Brook.

Before you start your journey into the woodlands of the Pioneer Valley, there are some regulations that must be taken into consideration. Motorized vehicles are prohibited from the entire trail. Horses or mountain bikes should not be used on the trail unless the ground is completely firm and dry. Open fires and camping are strictly prohibited.

This weekend take a break from stressful deadlines and take a trip into the woods. Absorb the beauty of the Robert Frost Trail and get inspired to follow your dreams.

"I shall be telling this with a sigh
Somewhere ages and ages hence
Two roads diverged in a wood, and I–
I took the one less traveled by,
And that made all the difference."

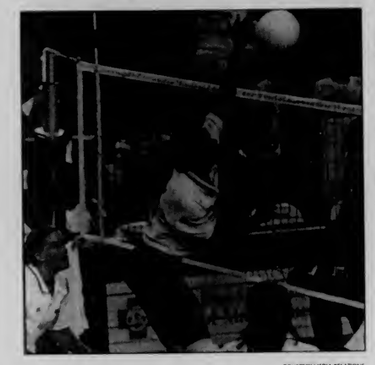
year ago when VTech volleyball joined the A-10.



The Colonials are 14-2 all time against Massachusetts, the series dates back to 1980. The Minutewomen have been relatively successful against GW under coach Bonnie Kenny, going a poor 1-5 against the perennial A-10 powerhouse. GW's tumultuous season has been marred by a seven game losing streak that followed a 2-0 start. Lately the Colonials have leveled off, going 5-4 in their last 9, including a 4-4 conference record and a win over Drexel.

The Hokies are led by the freshman 6-foot sisters tandem of Rachel and Britton Julian. The twin towers are leading the team in hitting percentage in conference matches at .255 and .250, respectively. Overall, Rachel Julian leads the team at .274. Defensively, Megan Barnes leads the team with 18 solo blocks, and Terpie Zubert has 2.9 digs per game.

Outside hitter Crystal Akens leads GW with 220 kills, 3.39 per game, Middle blocker Anna Krimmel leads with 13 solo blocks, and senior setter Kate Haubenreich averages 9.63 sets per game.

Massachusetts plays host this weekend while defending its 10-0 undefeated record at the Cage this season. The Minutewomen have never gone a full season without losing a home game. Their best such streak was in 1994, when they started the season winning 10 games at home before losing to Rhode Island.

UMass' recent road trip included two weekends of play against five conference opponents. Two weeks ago the Minutewomen went 2-1, beating La Salle and Fordham, while dropping a five game decision to Temple. This past weekend they split the two game tour d'Ohio, beating Xavier but falling to Dayton, again in five games.

players to propel their offense. Their main threat is Cesidio Colasante, a player Koch describes as,"...extremely dangerous, definitely an M.L.S. player."

However, he is a player who can be contained.

"He is someone Joe Jacobson (UMass senior defender) closed down last year," Koch said. "He will need to do the same this year."

Colasante has scored nine times and assisted on five goals in his first 10 games. Two of the tallies were game winners.

His favorite player to whom he feed those assists is freshman forward Shawn Jefremow (5 games, 4 goals, 1 assist in A-10 play).

"If we can stop them, then we can stop their team," commented Koch. "We are certainly capable of doing that. I think that they are going to have to worry about us, too. We have great firepower with Butler, Siljanovski and Castma."

UMass will also look to the speed and ball control of outside midfielders Tashi Tshering and Jake Brodsky. Koch also points to Paul Corcoran and Scott Regina as key players that will help keep possession in the Minutemen's favor.

"The bottom line is to make sure that we create as many chances as we can, and that we finish them," Koch said.

As the Minutemen prepare for these games, there is extra incentive for the seniors on the team. This trip may decide whether they have a post-season, or if their careers come to a premature close.

"We are more focused going into this weekend. We know we can't let down," Koch said. "We have to do the job."

As the team prepares for what may be the most important two games of the regular season, Koch remains utterly optimistic.

"I am confident that we will have a good weekend," he said.

ers who dominate their areas, like few others at any level. Combining power, speed, excellent field vision and outstanding technical skills, the Tietjens are the key to an often lethal attack.

Coach Len Tsantiris' team is so deep that Jana Carabino would be UMass' leading scorer with 24 points on the year, yet she has yet to start a match, as would Sherri Huckleberry who has started four. Ginny Woodward and Kerry Connors have combined to score 28 goals this year. UMass has scored 28 goals this year.

Meanwhile, still adjusting to the terrible loss of all-time leading scorer Rebecca Myers, UMass still has to set itself in the midfield while it prepares for its toughest challenge of the season. Rudy knows that he will have to cater his plans to his formidable foe.

"Tactically I don't think we can come out and stroke it around on them and expect to be successful," Rudy said. "If we don't focus and play very well we face the possibility of getting beaten big. They have a lot of speed and a lot of fire power. They've got a kid coming off the bench with more points than our leading scorer.

"They have raw speed all over the field with the exception of one position and that kid ain't slow. We're going to have to pick a part of the field that we want to defend and defend that part very well because we can't get stretched out like we did last year. They had us all over the field," Rudy said.

If the Minutewomen need scuba gear to find that field under the remnants of a hurricane, Rudy will be happier than a concessionaire selling umbrellas at the field, where in excess of 1,500 fans are expected to gather tomorrow.

Rain or shine, UMass must prepare for an all-out battle to save their NCAA slot and to save face against a powerful opponent. One thing is for certain though against the spectorous Huskies, if the Minutewomen open tomorrow with a lackluster showing like on Tuesday, even if it is sunny out, "It's a hard rain a' gonna fall."

UMass women's crew set for Head of the Charles

By Jason Tuohey
Collegian Correspondant

This Sunday, the city of Boston will host the most famous boat race in the world, the annual Head of the Charles Regatta. And the UMass women's crew will be there.

The Minutewomen have qualified three boats for this prestigious race. Their strongest boat is the women's heavyweight eight, which will race in the championship at 4 p.m. The women's lightweight eight will race at 1:25 p.m. The third boat races in the open four championship race, a race it finished second in last year.

The lightweight eight boat, which last year won a stunning victory at the Women's Lightweight Sprint Championships, is predicted to finish in the top five.

Needless to say, UMass coach Jim Deitz is being conservative when he lists his team's chances as "pretty optimistic."

The Minutewomen have been dominating their competition all year, and they are coming off a particularly successful race. Last week, at the Head of the Connecticut Regatta, the open-weight four boat came in third. Two boats raced in the lightweight fours, finishing second and fourth. The open eight boat finished second, losing to reigning national champion Brown. Brown beat the Minutewomen by 15 seconds (19:40 to 19:55).

"They are the national champs, and beating them would mean a lot," Dietz said about Brown.

The Head of the Charles is not a collegiate regatta, and thus the Minutewomen will be racing the best competition in the world, as well as the college ranks.

Both the United States and Canada are entered in the women's eight races. Countless international teams are headed to Boston to compete in both light and heavyweight divisions.

Due to its national fame, the Head of the Charles is much akin to the Boston Marathon in the respect that the world's best congregate there to compete.

Deitz is hoping that his boats will finish within the top five, but will not be disappointed if their positions end up slightly lower. Deitz believes that, at the very least, Sunday's races will be "a good gauge to see where we stand against other college teams."

"The team is very excited to be competing in Boston," senior co-captain Deanna Groark said. "The races will be a good test of our abilities."

If the Minutewomen keep up their present streak, it will be a good test of the other teams' abilities as well.

The accomplishments of Louis Farrakhan

Sunanda Ghosh

One year after the Million Man March, many people ask the question: "what has been accomplished?" One of the biggest steps taken by the Honorable Minister Louis Farrakhan has been a development of action and ideology, explicitly connecting the struggles of African-Americans to the struggles of people in the Third World.

In a series of powerful recent speeches that have focused on his foreign policy agenda and demonstrated the growth of Farrakhan's sophistication on international matters, the minister has argued that making the link with the Third World is the most important step for African-Americans.

Citing the examples of W.E.B. Du Bois, Marcus Garvey, Paul Robeson, Martin Luther King and Malcolm X, Farrakhan has been insisting that the United States government is most threatened by black leaders who reach out to the rest of the non-white world in Asia, Africa and Latin America. Farrakhan has repeatedly pointed out that it is when these leaders developed and acted on an international, rather than a more narrowly focused, perspective of the struggle for justice, that they became most effective as African-American leaders. He has added that it is often at this point in their careers that such leaders are targeted for assassination.

Clearly, Farrakhan feels that there is a distinguished tradition of linking the struggle in the United States with that of Third World peoples, and is seeking to continue to develop this approach by reaching out to many non-white nations suffering under U.S. colonial attack. Among his many recent impressive trips was an unexpected visit to Cuba, a progressive socialist Caribbean republic long targeted by American imperialism. Also Farrakhan was for many years one of the few prominent Americans to speak out in behalf of Palestinian human rights.

During his recent 13-country visit to the Middle East and Africa, Farrakhan was embraced by progressive leaders such as Nelson Mandela, Saddam Hussein and Moammar Gadhafi.

After his visit, Farrakhan was honored with the Gadhafi Award, plus $1 billion from Libya to help finance black businesses and other needs in America's inner cities.

After his acceptance of this award, the U.S. government fell into a state of panic, terrified by the prospect of cooperation between the African-American liberation movement and a proud, independent Third World country.

Virtually confirming Farrakhan's analysis, the State Department reacted by forbidding Farrakhan from accepting this award because of the U.S. embargo against Libya and demanding that Farrakhan register as a foreign agent of Libya. Farrakhan has vowed to sue.

At the one year anniversary of the Million Man March, Farrakhan called for a World's Day of Atonement outside of the United Nations' headquarters in New York. In his speech, Farrakhan condemned the U.S. government for the inhumane sanctions they imposed on Iraq, which have led to the deaths of hundreds of thousands of children. Without adequate food and medicine, these Iraqi children have been cruelly forced to suffer untimely and perfectly preventable deaths. Farrakhan also condemned the U.S. government for sanctions on Cuba, Libya, Sudan, Iran and Nigeria.

Even though the media claims, without evidence, that many of Farrakhan's followers are not interested in his foreign policy agenda, it is bringing in millions of dollars to help with domestic problems of undoubted popularity.

Unfortunately, many critics of Farrakhan have fixed ideas, and refuse to acknowledge the major development and growth in both his analysis and his activism on the world stage. Some can never admit the incredible impact of the Million Man March, within the African-American community in the United States, among the rest of the American public and internationally.

But through his powerful words, impressive achievements, inspiring organizational triumphs and increasing effectiveness as a teacher, Farrakhan is certain to continue to befuddle his critics, astound his supporters and proceed as an increasing force for good in the world.

Why Palestine is the priority

Shyamala Ivatury

Advocates of Zionism and defenders of Israel have been describing advocacy for Palestinian human and national rights as an idee fixe and irrational obsession for the writers of this page. Rather than confront the moral challenge or debate the facts, they resort to questioning the motivations of those who raise questions about Israeli colonialism.

Why, they ask, is this issue returned to again and again? Why should the question of Palestine be uppermost in the minds of students, not just from the Middle East, but from Seoul, South Korea to San Jose, Costa Rica? Why do students from across the Third World, from Calcutta to Fujian, continue to focus on the question of Palestine?

Since the inception of the Developing Nations Page, we have been attempting to explain Third World perspectives to Americans. Chief among these is our moral opposition to the continued injustices perpetuated by the west, whether in Vietnam, apartheid South Africa, Namibia, Panama, Iraq, Haiti, Cuba, Nicaragua or Palestine.

We write of the horrors of living under the guns of occupation, the dehumanizing experience of enduring racial segregation, bombs destroying Third World cities, sanctions that cut off food and medical aid for small babies and military bases that cause the rape and sale of Third World women. We write because we have seen these injustices with our own eyes. We write for you because we hold out hope in your humanity and moral conscience, believing that if you could only see the truth, you too would be against oppression, colonialism and injustice. It is this moral compass that focuses our attention on injustice in Palestine at this time.

The '50s and '60s saw the break up of old large colonial empires of Britain, France, Portugal, Holland and others and the emergence of a number of independent Third World nation-states in Asia and Africa. Naturally, this was the focus of international anti-colonial concern at that time.

In the '70s and '80s, anti-racist, anti-colonialist people the world over-focused on the continuing struggles in southern Africa, especially South Africa. During this time both Mozambique and Angola were still colonies of Portugal, and in Rhodesia (now known as Zimbabwe), South Africa and Namibia, the European-settler community imposed apartheid on the African population. As Southern Africa remained replete with the most inhumanely racist and barbaric regimes, it was natural and correct that the struggles in this area were prioritized by morally conscious, anti-racist and anti-colonialist people all over the world.

Most Third world countries ostracized these nations as international pariahs, sponsored a number of United Nations resolutions condemning the racist regimes, and materially and financially supported the liberation movements in these areas. As the images of Sweto and Sharpville filtered through their consciousness, many citizens of the United States and other western nations fought apartheid, demanding that institutions and corporations divest from South Africa. University campuses were rife with anti-apartheid rallies, newspaper articles and takeovers as student activists expressed their moral outrage.

After magnificent liberation struggles, Mozambique and Angola are independent nations, and apartheid has been abolished in Zimbabwe, Namibia and South Africa. Nonetheless, colonialism is not eradicated. On the contrary, in some parts of the world, it is flourishing and expanding.

Perhaps the most gruesome example of colonialism today is the Middle East in Palestine. Here the majority native population witnessed the destruction of their country and the usurpation of their land by European settlers. Israel was established in 1947 by the Western powers as a Jewish state, and most of its 75 percent Arab majority were expelled.

From its inception, the Zionist dream of the creation Israel was a typical 19th century racist colonial project. The founding fathers of Zionism were well aware of their participation in a broader project of European colonialism, and used it to their advantage in the creation of Israel.

In 1896, when Theodore Herzl first articulated his Zionist vision in his book The Jewish State, colonialism and racism did not have the same dirty, and immoral connotations they have these days. Herzl and the other Zionist founders envisaged the creation of an European outpost in Asia to protect the interests of the European empires and to continue their the "European Civilizing mission" in Asia.

In his book, Herzl stated that "We should there [in Palestine] form a portion of the rampart of Europe against Asia, an outpost of civilization as opposed to barbarism. We should as a neutral state remain in contact with all Europe, which would have to guarantee our existence."

In remarks to the First Zionist Congress in 1897, he stated "It is more and more to the interest of the civilized nations and of civilization in general that a cultural station be established on the shortest road to Asia. Palestine is this station and we Jews are the bearers of culture who are ready to give our property and our lives to bring about its creation."

Israel's first Prime Minister, David Ben Gurion, pointed out "We were not just working — we were conquering, conquering a land. We were a company of conquistadors."

The Zionists placed themselves at the service of the British Empire and road the backs of the imperialists Into Palestine. The Balfour Declaration tied British imperialism and Zionist colonialism together. As Zionist leader Max Nordau told British leaders in 1919, "We know what you expect from us: We shall have to be the guards of the Suez canal. We shall have to be the sentinels of your way to India via the Near East. We are ready to fulfill this difficult military service, but it is essential to allow us to become a power in order to enable us to do our task."

Above the objections of the overwhelming majority of the people of Palestine, the British imperialists who took over began a project of facilitating huge waves of European Jewish immigration in Palestine, altering the demographics of the nation at the point of a gun. Palestinian resistance reached its height in the first Palestinian War of Independence, known in the west as the "Arab rebellion" in 1936. The British and Zionists collaborated in fighting to deny freedom to the Palestinians.

After World War II, the British withdrew from a Palestine in which they had ensured that the settler minority was well armed and prepared for conflict, whereas the indigenous majority were being suppressed by both imperialists and colonialists. By force of arms, the 25 percent European minority declared Palestine a "Jewish state," and expelled most of the Palestinian population.

In 1948, over a million Palestinians were hounded from their villages and cities and forced to become the stateless, homeless refugees they remain until today, while those that remained in Israel are accorded the status of second class citizens subjected to apartheid laws. Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza in 1967, enforcing an occupation that continues to condemn its native Palestinians to a life surrounded by guns, tanks and Israeli soldiers. In fact, Zionism really permits only three realities for Palestinians, life under Apartheid in Israel, under occupation in the West Bank and Gaza, or in exile in neighboring Arab states.

Furthermore, Israel has continued to not only engage in the worst racism in areas under its control, it has also continued to do as Nordau promised, serve as an attack dog of imperialism. In 1956, for example, Israel made a secret agreement with Britain and France, which wanted to recapture the Suez Canal from Egypt. The deal was that Israel would attack Egypt, and Britain and France would seize the canal in the course of a "peace-keeping" effort.

Furthermore, Israel was always extremely close with its sister apartheid state of South Africa, with which it developed low level nuclear canons and other weapons for use against indigenous people of color. Jane Hunter has decried "Israel's dealings with the scum of the world's tyrants — including the white clique in South Africa, Somoza of Nicaragua, General Pinochet of Chile, Marcos or the Phillipines, Duvalier of Haiti, Mobutu of Zaire..."

In fact, the Israelis have few qualms about being a proxy for western imperialists throughout the Third World. In 1981, for example, Israeli cabinet minister Yacov Meridor told the United States that in the Third World, "Israel will be your proxy."

Both in its internal racist structure, and foreign policy, Israel is surely the most racist state in the contemporary globe, and in its despicable role in international affairs, therefore, no nation is more worthy of criticism and concern than Israel.

But, Israel and Zionism are not only the paramount moral priority for anti-racists and anti-colonialists for these reasons. There is a strategic focus on the Middle East by the world's last major imperial power — the United States. The American Empire stakes its future on the control and dominance of this oil-rich region, as the enormous U.S. military build-up in the Persian Gulf region demonstrates.

In the Middle East, the disposition of and injustice towards the Palestinian people remains the greatest cause of concern, anger and instability. It is understood that the cause of Palestine is the one above all which can rouse the populations of all the Arab nations and Iran. The Islamic political revival places the question of Palestine at the very center of its agenda for a new Middle East.

So do the State Department and the Pentagon. These agencies of American imperial rule are well aware of the centrality of the question of Palestine, and seek to pacify Palestinian demands for justice with subterfuges like the so- called Oslo peace accords. Now, even that deal, which grants Palestinians none of their basic rights, is too much for the Israeli government. Predictably, such half-measures and phoney reforms led again to violence, with Palestinians, as always, being massacred by well-armed Israelis.

In the words of the great moral leader and anti-colonialist fighter, Mohandas K. Gandhi, "The Jews have erred grievously in seeking to impose themselves on Palestine with the aid of America and Britain, and now with the aid of naked terrorism."

The priority of the struggle for Palestinian human rights and against Zionism, which seems so obvious to so many of us, is therefore based on both a moral assessment as well as an understanding of the goals and methods of contemporary imperialism.

The courageous Comandante Ramona, an Indiginous Tzotzil woman said to be dying of kidney cancer, is leading Zapatista negotiators in talks with the Mexican government. In recent weeks she has again emerged as a national symbol of the struggle of Mexico's 9 million indigenous people for freedom and equality, and of the Zapatista movement in general. Her most recent statement is below.

Mensaje del Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional en la celebración del 12 de octubre de 1996.

Al pueblo de México, Hermanos y hermanas:

Por mi voz habla la voz del Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional.

Hoy hemos venido hasta aquí, hasta el centro de este país que se llama México, para decirle a todos los mexicanos y mexicanas unas cuantas palabras que tenemos nosotros los zapatistas.

De por sí es muy pequeña nuestra palabra de los zapatistas, pero su paso es muy grande y camina muy lejos y se entra en muchos corazones.

Estos corazones que nos escucharon son de hombres, mujeres, niños y ancianos que quieren un país democrático, libre y justo.

Estos corazones son los que nos ayudaron a llegar hasta el Zócalo de la ciudad de México.

Estos corazones quieren lo mismo que los zapatistas queremos y lo que todos queremos.

Queremos un México que nos tome en cuenta como seres humanos, que nos respete y reconozca nuestra dignidad.

Por eso queremos unir nuestra pequeña voz de zapatistas a la voz grande de todos los que luchan por un México nuevo.

Llegamos hasta aquí para gritar, junto con todos, los ya no, que nunca más un México sin nosotros.

Eso queremos, un México donde todos tengamos un lugar digno.

Por eso estamos dispuestos a participar en un gran diálogo nacional con todos.

Un diálogo donde nuestra palabra sea una palabra más en muchas palabras y nuestro corazón sea un corazón más dentro de muchos corazones.

Para este diálogo nacional vamos a caminar mucho y vamos a dar muchos pasos.

Nosotros estamos dispuestos a todo para dar estos pasos.

Pero necesitamos que todos ustedes nos ayuden a caminar a todos los zapatistas, así como me ayudaron a mí a caminar hasta aquí.

Hermanos y hermanas mexicanos:

Yo soy la comandante Ramona del Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional.

Soy el primero de muchos pasos de los zapatistas al Distrito Federal y a todos los lugares de México.

Esperamos que todos ustedes caminen junto a nosotros.

Esta es nuestra palabra, hermanos y hermanas mexicanos.

Gracias.

Desde el Zócalo de la ciudad de México Distrito Federal.

Por el Comité Clandestino Revolucionario Indígena-Comandancia General del Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional.

Comandante Ramona, México, octubre de 1996.

By the time I was 8, I didn't want to go on that ride and I complained to the guy that it was a waste of time steering cars.

UMass looks to hit Homecoming Bulls–eye

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

Led Zeppelin once sang, "To everyone, a little rain must fall."

Under threats of stormy weather, the Massachusetts football team will go for their fourth win in five tries Saturday when the University at Buffalo Bulls come to Warren P. McGuirk Stadium in a non–conference battle.

This weekend is Homecoming, and alumni and students alike are expected to brave the reported rain and check out the first place Minutemen, who sit atop the Yankee Conference's New England Division with a 3–1 conference mark, and a 4–2 overall record.

As for Buffalo (5–2), the Bulls remain somewhat of a mystery to UMass coach Mike Hodges and his staff.

"Because they're not in our conference, we don't have the luxury of knowing them," Hodges said. "It's very difficult to evaluate personnel when you haven't seen them play. We know that they're very well coached, don't do anything fancy and play a balanced offensive attack."

Last season the Minutemen beat the Bulls 33–9 up in Buffalo. Senior tailback Frank Alessio had 172 yards rushing, UMass legend Rene Ingoglia had three touchdowns, and UMass held Buffalo to only 32 yards rushing.

Buffalo has played only one other Yankee Conference team this season, back on Sept. 7, when it lost to Connecticut 20–3. Other than that, and a tough 17–6 loss to Division I–AA powerhouse Youngstown State last weekend, the Bulls have been on fire. The independent Bulls have beaten Illinois State, Cornell, Colgate, Lehigh and Edinboro so far this season.

Buffalo plays a style of offense that closely resembles UMass. Primarily a running team, the Bulls are led by junior tailback Anthony Swan, who currently ranks 19th in the nation with 781 rushing yards and seven touchdowns on 160 carries, with 111.6 yard average per game. Senior fullback Todd Pace has also shined for the Bulls, gaining 523 yards and four touchdowns so far this season.

When it comes to the air attack, Buffalo is led by senior quarterback Mark Taylor, who has gone 71–for–135 in seven games, with 869 yards and three touchdowns. Primary targets include wideouts Kali Watkins, with 25 catches for 390 yards, and Jamie Gasparre, who has snagged 24 passes for 372 yards.

For the Minutemen, last Saturday's thrashing of the Boston University Terriers put them back on track after a tough loss to Rhode Island two weeks ago, and Hodges's squad has a chance to advance to the Division 1–AA playoffs for the first time since 1990. Although Hodges is cautiously optimistic, he knows there's still a lot of work ahead.

"There could have been a negative reaction after the URI game, but the kids kept their heads up," Hodges said. "Being 4–2 doesn't mean a whole hell of a lot when you realize we could still end up 4–7. But we still have everything open for us, and it's more fun to play knowing that."

Keying the win on Saturday was the defense. Except for abberations against Villanova and Rhode Island, the UMass defense has been solid all year. Senior linebacker Justin Reimer leads the Yankee Conference with 77 tackles, and sophomore linebacker Khari Samuel has chipped with 62 tackles and four sacks. The defense scored as many points as the BU offense did last week, with defensive backs Leggie Beckford and Jerard White racking up TD's.

"Last week we played very well defensively," Hodges said. "When your defense scores two touchdowns, the game shouldn't be close, and it wasn't."

Saturday will mark the third start for freshman quarterback Jeff Smith. Smith rebounded from a tough outing against Rhode Island on Oct. 5 when he threw for 150 yards and two touchdowns against BU, earning Yankee Conference Rookie of the Week honors.

"Jeff struggled in the first half," Hodges said. "But the great thing about him is he has the ability to shake off any mistakes and keep playing. Hopefully he'll continue to mature and improve."

The weather forecast for this Homecoming weekend is not a good one. Rain is expected to fall all day Saturday, but Hodges insists it will not affect his team.

"You can't do much about it," Hodges said. "It'll be a little more difficult defensively because you don't know where they're going and the mud slows down the reaction time, but we practice in the rain, so we're really not too concerned."

Alessio, who has been banged up since the home opener against Northeastern, will play Saturday despite nagging shoulder and rib ailments. He has been participating in non– contact drills in practice all week, and the coaching staff has been very careful not to aggravate those injuries.

Men's soccer faces two in pivotal A–10 weekend

By Chris Krein
Collegian Staff

If the Massachusetts men's soccer team is going to establish itself as a serious contender for the Atlantic 10 conference title, this weekend will provide the proving grounds.

The team travels south to challenge Fordham in the Bronx on Friday at Edward's Parade. Then, it will wrap–up the weekend against the LaSalle Explorers in Philadelphia on Sunday.

The Minutemen are in the middle of a conference log jam that should begin to sort out the contenders from the pretenders after this weekend's action.

There are six teams lumped near the top of the standings in the twelve team conference. Only four teams will make the post season tournament. The teams that are vying with the Minutemen for a chance at post–season play are Rhode Island, Dayton, La Salle, Fordham, and Virginia Tech. Duquesne and St. Bonaventure have remote, outside shots but are not considered to seriously challenge the top six.

With five games to play, the Minutemen, who are currently tied for fourth place with a 4–2–0 A–10 record (7–4–1 overall) need to continue the aggressive play that has marked their recent games.

The Minutemen will be counting heavily on senior All– American candidate Dave Siljanovski (5 goals, 1 assist) and Junior forward Mike Butler (6 g, 4 a). Jcenal Castma has contributed to the attack, creating and taking advantage of offensive opportunities that have resulted in three goals in eight games.

They will need solid play from keeper Jeff Jablonski, who is currently rated fourth in the conference with a 1.28 goals against average (GAA). He has started every conference game and has compiled a 4–2 in A–10 matches.

The Fordham Rams enter Friday's showdown tied with UMass for fourth place in A–10 action with 12 points. Fordham is 6–8 on the year, 4–1 in conference.

UMass will have to stop potent midfielder, John Wolyniec, who has 27 points on the year, coming from 11 goals and 5 assists. They will also need to contain Robert Zuclich, a forward that has put away six goals in 12 games.

It is the other side of the ball, though, that has UMass head coach, Sam Koch, concerned.

"Fordham is very solid defensively," Koch said. "At home they are a very hard team to beat."

Fordham netminder Devin Moore will be a formidable task for the Minutemen's arsenal. He is leading all A–10 keepers with a .075 GAA in four conference starts. He is 3–1–0 in those games.

Koch's game plan will be to neutralize their offense and try to create opportunities around the Ram's net.

"If we work hard off the ball, we can take advantage of the fact that they play man to man defense, and we can stretch them," Koch said. "If we use the space we create, then I think we should be able to do well."

The Minutemen will face an even more formidable opponent on Sunday when they travel to McCarthy Stadium in Philadelphia. La Salle is the lone undefeated team in Atlantic 10 play, compiling a record of 5–0–1, and an equally impressive 9–1–1 record overall.

UM praying for rain and mud to slow Huskies' speed

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

In the late 1940's, when the Atlanta Braves called the area now occupied by Boston University's football field and hockey rink home, they had two outstanding pitchers in Warren Spahn and Johnny Sain who highlighted a pitching staff that otherwise could not have beaten Brockton High School, let alone Jackie Robinson's Brooklyn Dodgers. Thus, the team adopted the motto "Spahn and Sain and pray for rain."

For tomorrow's contest at No. 4 Connecticut (14–1), the motto for the No. 11 Massachusetts women's soccer team (10–1–1) could well be "Lynch and Powell and hope you need a towel."

On a Richard F. Garber Field pitch that had standing water and resembled the Everglades in the north goal mouth, UMass played an even contest against their hated rivals on Oct. 21 of last year, but on a dry surface at UConn Soccer Stadium in November, the Huskies' blazing team speed burnt UMass, bouncing it from the NCAA Tournament.

So, with a forecast for heavy rains tomorrow, don't be shocked if charismatic UMass head coach Jim Rudy is spoted leading his team in a rain dance before boarding their bus to Storrs, just in case.

All conceivable pregame preparations will be taken for a match that became pivotal in UMass' postseason positioning, in the wake of a 2–0 loss to Dartmouth on Tuesday. Rudy meanwhile needs not be reminded of the importance of beating UConn, a school he apparently is not a huge fan of in any way, shape or fashion.

"You never forget about UConn, because you have [equipment room fixture] Tommy Bishko reminding you to beat UConn every time he sees you — 100 to 150 times a year, 'beat UConn,' and you never forget that.

"I don't particularly like dark blue or wear dark blue. I will never have a husky as a dog, and I will never send my son to a farm school out in the sticks," Rudy said.

"I don't particularly like dark blue or wear dark blue. I will never have a husky as a dog, and I will never send my son to a farm school out in the sticks. Does that answer your question?" — Jim Rudy

The deep seeded hatred of the Huskies will help motivate a UMass side that opened apathetically against the Big Green, in a game that is suddenly a must–win, or at least a must–show, for the team to sustain its NCAA hopes.

NCAA hopes aside though, most of UConn's 1996 opponents are just hoping to sustain their sanity. The Huskies have outscored their opponents by an 83–7 margin this year, four times cracking double digits and their accomplishments have not gone unnoticed by the students in Storrs.

The Huskies have averaged 1,189 fans for their home matches, sixth in the nation, including a whopping 3,711 for their match against current No. 1 Notre Dame.

UConn has four of the top five scorers in the Northeast Region, and four of the top 12 in the nation in assists.

Both these lists include Jennifer and Margaret Tietjen, the Huskies' identical twin outside midfield–

Ole, Ole, Ole... hail United; Tiger proves he's the man

Around the Horn
with Jorma Kansanen

Well, it has been over two years, and I finally get my chance to write about golf. I am wearing a thermal shirt, under my Eric Cantona jersey, on an absolutely beautiful day. But I digress, so, let's go:

• Ole, Ole, Ole, Ole...

No, I am not practicing for the time when I will be a member of the Fanatic Forty, but I am talking about a certain little Reds team across the Pond, and it ain't Liverpool, for all you bloody Scousers in the viewing public. Manchester United always seems to get the right players in their lineup, and at the right time of the year. But a few years back, the Reds took a chance on former Newcastle striker Andy Cole, and bought him from the Black and Whites for mega–millions.

"Red Hot" Cole was more of an "Ice Cold" sensation, as the fiery gamer Paul Scholes almost got more goals than the massively expensive starter. But at the start of this year, coach Alex Ferguson came through for the Old Trafford faithful, getting the Norwegian international Ole Gunnar Solskjaer to try out at his striker position. For Ferguson, he does not use the glamour position in a more recognized way, as England legend Kevin Keegan uses for his offensively– minded Newkie squad, and Cole could not come back and defend to save his job.

Well, he lost his job, and Solskjaer has been lighting the lamp... sorry, wrong sport. For one thing, you have to love his name. The "Gunnar" from the frozen tundra of Norway... the Awesome Oslo Machine "Gunnar"... Ole "Soul Man" Solskjaer... well proper, there mate. But more importantly, he has fit in perfectly in the Ferguson system, and the team is in the top five of the Premiership again. Along with other off–season additions in Dutch legend Johann Cruyff's son, Jordi Cruyff, one of the stars from the '96 Euro Cup semifinalist Czech Republic squad, Karel Poborsky and a quality backup for the god–like Peter Schmeichel in keeper Raymound van Der Gouw, the man from Scotland has formed another fantastic side. Looks like it is so, as they beat the previously unbeaten Liverpool side by a tight 1–0 margin at Old Trafford last weekend.

Glory, glory, Man–United.

• Catch a Tiger by his tail...

One of the best stories to arise in golf, if not all of sports, this year is the ascension of Tiger Woods from amateur to professional status in the gentlemanly game. I don't know about that gentlemanly stuff, I don't think anyone has seen me put a drive three times consecutively in the drink... it can get ugly. But this man (yes, he can now be considered The Man) is a gentleman through and through, and he is one of the best things to happen to the game of golf in recent history, along with the sweet short game of former two–time NCAA champ, Phil Mickelson.

Not just for the fact that Tiger set an almost unbeatable precedent in winning three straight U.S. Amateur Championships, and then specifically for his game, foregoing a pretty much meaningless stay at Stanford, but he is the first American man of color to penetrate the racial stigma of the PGA Tour since Calvin Peete and Jim Dent.

But the thing is that those two did not do anything, and with the prospect of Woods' potential, more than the superficial face of the game could be changed forever, but the game itself. He already has his Tour card set for next year, as he will safely be in the top 120 on the money list at the end of this year... good.

I don't know about this racial stigma concerning golf, but the PGA has got to make the game more accessible for more than minorities. They have to get rid of the Old Boy network attitude that still pervades the sport, and you can't tell me it's because the equipment is too expensive. I still use the Titleist irons, the ones I throw in the woods after every bad shot, that I got for $50 five years ago. I still hit m y

Volleyball at home; win streak at stake

This weekend marks the passing of the halfway point for the Massachusetts women's volleyball team's Atlantic 10 schedule.

With a 16–5 record (5–3 A–10), the Minutewomen hope to end a relative low point of their season after going 3–2 on a recent road trip. George Washington comes to town Friday, and Virginia Tech visits on Saturday. Both matches will be played at 7 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Virginia Tech (10–9, 4–4 A–10) hosted GW (7–11, 4–4 A– 10) on Sept. 27, and won a hard–fought three–game match, 15–10, 15–6, and 17–15. GW led in almost every team and individual statistical category, but numbers like 14 service errors, only 4 total blocks and a meager .133 hitting percentage, as compared to the Hokies' 4 errors, 7 blocks and .228 hitting, contained the youthful Colonials.

Va. Tech appears to be the Minutewomen's tougher competition this weekend. The Hokies are 3–4 against opponents that they have had in common with the Minutewomen, while the latter have gone 6–2 against that group of teams. The overall series between the two teams is tied 1–1, having started only a

One goal was all the Massachusetts field hockey team needed to stop an albeit short losing streak yesterday, as the Minutewomen blanked Providence 1–0 in Rhode Island.

The win stopped a two–game losing streak that resulted from a pair of 1–0 losses last weekend (to Syracuse and Boston University). The No. 8 Minutewomen now stand at 10–4, 3–0 in the Atlantic 10. The Lady Friars drop to 5–8.

Massachusetts' lone goal came courtesy of senior midfielder Kyle Rothenberger, who connected on a penalty corner situation with 7:38 remaining in the first half.

Sophomore Kate Putnam and freshman Saskia Fuchs were credited with the assist on the game winner.

Senior goaltender Hilary Rose was especially strong on the afternoon, making 14 saves to record her fourth shutout of the season.

Providence goalie Jamie Soferiades was credited with 11 stops on the day.

The UMass offensive attack tallied 14 shots in the game, while PC had 18. UMass was 1–for–9 on penalty corners, the Lady

UM professors aid in Comet exploration

By Daniel E. Levenson
Collegian Staff

The work of two University of Massachusetts professors contributed to a recent internaitonal undetaking to learn more about the composition of comets.

UMass Professor William Irvine, former director of the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory and Professor Peter Schloeb, current director of the program, led the local effort. UMass doctoral candidate Amy Lovell was also involved along with the two professors in the organization of the research.

According to a recent press release, the international team "used radio telescopes to observe Comet Hakutake when it blazed across the skyin the Spring of 1996."

Schloeb said that the team discovered the presence of a chemical compound called hydrogen isocyanide, previously not known to exist in comets.

"This was the first detection of that molecule in a comet," said Schloeb.

The chance to examine the chemical make–up of comets provided scientists with informaiton that could have far– reahcing implicaitons in our understanding of the origins of life on earth.

"This particular oppurtunity arose with comet Hyakutake," said Schloeb.

In the October 3, 1996 issue of the journal Nature, Irvine and those he worked with based conclusions on their observaitons of Hayakutake; specifically — that the components of comets are the same as the materials which stars are composed of and that they may be responsible for some of the organic material which now exists on Earth.

In a press release, it was stated that "some astronomers have theorized that comets could have been a delivery mechanism for pre–biological organic matter that ultimately helped develope or even triggered life on earth."

Schloeb noted that another comet, this one named Hale– Bopp will pass Earth during the next few months, and should be visible with binoculars.

David Van Blerkom, professor of physics and astronomy explained how radio astronomy works.

"All things in the universe are made of charged particles," Van Blerkom said. "Objects in the universe emit what's called electromagnetic radiaiton or ellectromagnetic waves."

The frequecny of many of these waves is either too high or too low to obsevred visually. By using radio tellescopes astronomers can observe these waves.

"There's a much, much more broad rnage of ellectromagnetic waves than what our eyes can see," said Van Blerkom.

Hang Gliding club offers beginner lessons

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

This weekend the University of Massachusetts Hang Gliding club will be offering a beginner's trip to Morningside Flight Park in New Hampshire.

"Usually no one had ever gone hang gliding before they get to UMass," said Walker Korby, who was the club's president for the past three semesters.

At least 20 students are needed for the trip in order to receive group prices.

The qualified instructors "teach you all the basics— in order to become certified," said Korby.

After the initial beginner's weekend, which costs $100, participants must return to the hill for four or five more lessons or until they feel they are ready to be tested.

Each of these subsequent lessons costs $60, however the Hang gliding Club pays $20.

"There is no set time on how long it takes to become certified, it could take only 5 months... it could take you five years. It depends upon the person and how often they get up to New Hampshire to practice," Korby said.

Upon passing the test, club members will receive their Hang 1 rating and may choose to become a member of the US Hang Gliding Association.

After receiving their Hang 1 rating, gliders are qualified to go to the top of the hill which is a height of 450 feet.

However, most participants do not go straight to the top. "Instructors do not let you go higher than they think you can handle," said Vice President Owen Gintis.

Most instructors divide the hill into 100 and 200 foot levels, explained Korby.

"They usually require that you jump 20 times from each level," he said.

Once students become certified with the Hang 1 rating, they can use the hill at the flight station for only $10 per visit.

In order to receive a Hang 2 rating, students must fly a certain number of hours.

Gintis said it is "not something that can be earned while at UMass," due to the amount of time it takes.

Korby compares the methods of hang gliding to skiing. "everytime you go you get higher and higher up on the hill, until you are at the top."

"You run down the hill and you can feel the ground leave your feet," he said. "It's the closest humans will ever get to having wings. It's really a great thing to get involved in if you are truly interested."

Korby explained while gliding at high altitudes, gliders may get caught in thermals.

"There are these neat things called thermals. A thermal is hot air that circles in currents that make you go up instead of down. You have learn how to maneuver yourself while in them."

A world record has been set by a hang glider that spent more than 30 hours gliding due to thermals.

Both Korby and Gintis agree that students who are interested in hang gliding should try it while at UMass.

"If you are ever going to do it, this is the time to get involved. There will probably never be another time to hang glide for this little money," said Korby.

"It is a great opportunity...at any other time it would be impractical because once you get you Hang 1 you must buy your own glider which can cost thousands," said Gintis.

The hang gliding club owns its own equipment which also helps to keep the cost of lessons down because students do not need to worry about renting it.

It is stored on campus and at the flight station.

The Hang Gliding club has existed since the mid 80's.

Currently, there are about 40 active members but Korby said that number usually decreases to 20 due to money problems.

The Hang Gliding Club meets every Tuesday at 6:30 p.m. in the Campus Center. Check the information desk for room numbers.

Club membership is $20.

If interested in attending the beginners weekend on Oct. 19–20 or would like more information call 545–0804 or visit the office at 433 Student Union.

10–year–old helps save teen dangling from noose

WESTOVER, W.Va. (AP) — A teen–ager hanging from a noose in a Halloween attraction had passed out and turned blue in the face, and a 10–year–old girl thought it was just part of the act. Then Holly Leverett realized something was wrong with 15–year–old Matt Feicht and screamed for help.

Feicht was in fair condition today at Ruby Memorial Hospital in adjacent Morgantown, a spokesman said.

Holly told authorities she thought the teen–ager was wearing blue makeup for the stunt Sunday at a haunted hayride fund–raiser. "She kept telling him to open his eyes or she was going to tell someone," her mother, Denise Boyd, said Tuesday. "She told him: 'Open your eyes, you're scaring me.'"

Then Holly noticed that Matt was drooling and she screamed, Ms. Boyd said. That brought Kevin Schuller, who used his Boy Scout pocket knife to cut the rope while 6-foot-3 Jason Dorinzi helped support Feicht's weight.

Police Chief William Helmick said officers had not yet been able to question the young drama student in the hospital.

He was supposed to be protected by a safety belt, harness and rope, Helmick said. Police examined the equipment but found no problems, he said.

Proceeds from the annual hayride in this Morgantown suburb go to SteppingStones, a nonprofit organization that provides therapy for children with disabilities, recreational programs and a preschool program.

New Afro—Am prof. teaches the blues

By Daniel F. Auger
Collegian Correspondent

The W.E.B. Du Bois Afro–American studies department has added a blues musician turned professor to its faculty this year — a man who has played with some of the most renowned acts in music.

Professor Steven Tracy, a Cincinnati native, has an extensive background in blues, jazz, soul and gospel. The many experiences that he will bring to the classroom are unique, especially coming from a middle–class white man who has three university degrees and is barely 40.

Tracy's love for music was ingrained in him during his early childhood through his family and the African–American community in Cincinatti. He was exposed to gospel by the radio and his parents.

The Hang Gliding club has existed since the mid 80's.

"My Father played gospel songs on Echo harp and my mother sang to my brothers and myself as children," said Tracy.

He was exposed to soul and jazz through the local community at a "pony keg" (convenience store) where his father worked. He was also exposed to African–American music in funeral rites at a nearby cemetery.

Growing up, he was further influenced by such artists as Little Walter, Elmore James, and B. B. King who all received substantial air time on the radio.

Tracy played the trumpet in his high school marching band and also taught himself to play the harmonica by imitating his father and older brother. This was the instrument that gave him his first "break" into the world of music.

At age 16, Tracy entered a harmonica playing contest at a local park. Surprisingly, he went on to win the local, regional, and national competitions and was asked to appear on "The Tonight Show," with Johnny Carson.

This opened many doors for Tracy. He wrote articles for various blues magazines and continued his education after high school.

His first book, Langston Hughes and the Blues, was published while he was working on his doctorate at the University of Cincinatti in 1988.

Since then, he has also written a second book that explores the merging of black and white musical styles in Cincinatti, entitled Going To Cincinatti: a History of the Blues in the Queen City. It was published in 1993.

In 1990, Steve Tracy and a group of musicians that he had played with since his teens released a CD entitled "Steve Tracy and the Crawling Kingsnakes." Tracy sung, played harmonica and wrote compositions for the band.

The group then toured blues clubs, including a set of appearances in the Netherlands, where the band, as well as the CD, received rave reviews.

While touring, Tracy and his band played with such acts as King and Bo Diddley. After the tour, Tracy returned home to be with his family and taught at a local high school.

Soon after, he received offers to teach full time at the university level, including the University of Massachusetts. After interviewing with various universities, he decided to come to UMass.

This is the first time that Tracy has ever taught in this capacity. He selected UMass because it now offers a Ph.D. in Afro–American studies. He did not feel comfortable teaching a subject which at other universities may exist only as a subdivision of another major.

"I would have to separate the performer me, the folklore me, and the teacher me, etc. to teach in that manner. That is not always possible nor favorable," said Tracy about that style of teaching. He prefers to use his musical experiences and abilities along with text to achieve a better understanding of the subject.

For example, Tracy said that when he teaches about an Afro–American writer who was influenced by gospel, he could either present or sing some gospel music in class.

This semester, Tracy is teaching a course on the Harlem Renaissance and will teach a blues history course next semester.

About the University, Tracy said, "UMass has a very open campus that is very accepting to different ideas. The students have been very responsive to everything I have thrown out to them."

As for his days as a performing musician, he hopes to bring his band from Cincinatti to the area in the near future.

Canadians disapprove of Dylan s use of song

By David Crary
Associated Press

TORONTO — The times indeed have changed.

Outraging some members of the '60s generation, a major Canadian bank is using Bob Dylan's 1964 protest anihem, "The Times They Are A-Changin'" as the theme for its current marketing campaign. Fans are aiming their wrath not only at the Bank of Montreal but at Dylan himself, for letting the song go commercial.

The bank is using the song "to help it do what it has always done — make money," an Ontario reader, Patricia Woodhatch, wrote to the Toronto Globe and Mail. "The real villain is Bob Dylan, who traded in a generation's memories when he allowed the song to be used as an advertising jingle, probably for a tidy profit." The bank, number three in Canada and 10th in North America, won't say how much it paid for rights to the song. But executives were unapologetic when asked about the ads during a news conference Wednesday announcing a major expansion of its electronic banking services.

"We have done massive amounts of testing, and the reaction is overwhelmingly positive," said bank chairman Matthew W. Barrett. "I find it incredible that people see some outrage... in something as relatively benign as that."

An ad shown widely on Canadian television over the past week depicts a throng of children marching through the countryside while Dylan's originally strident song is turned into feel-good music reminiscent of "We are the World."

John Haslett Cuff, a television critic for the Globe and Mail, wrote in a scathing column this week that the bank "has Disneyfied Dylan." He noted that the ad omitted one of the song's harshest lines — "Your sons and your daughters are beyond your command." "The notion that such an amoral, ultra-conservative establishment insitution would use a civil-rights era protest song to peddle its so-called services, and in the process sanitize a generation's profoundest memories, is disgusting," Cuff wrote. Barrett said the bank's decision to use the song was "absolutely easy" and contended that only a small minority of the public viewed the ads as misuse of a cultural icon.

"Great art is timeless," he said. "The notion that it can't be used in a different context is infantile."

The new ad is an offshoot of a prolonged TV marketing campaign that features ads shot in grainy black-and-white, showing supposedly ordinary Canadians trying to cope with change and posing the question: "Can a bank change?"

The bank says it has answered that question affirmatively with the new banking operation announced Wednesday. Called "mbanx," it will offer a personal portfolio manager for all clients and round-the-clock electronic banking services.

The service will operate across North America through the Bank of Montreal in Canada, its Harris Bank subsidiary in the United States and its Bancomer affiliate in Mexico.

Two Globe and Mail readers offered the bank an updated version of Dylan's song, including these lyrics:

"Come latter-day hippies, please heed the call. You're all pre-approved at the Bank of Montreal... Say good-bye to your memories, your culture and all.

For the prime, it is a-changin'."

Minutemen look toward Buffalo hunt

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

This Saturday, the University of Massachusetts football team plays host to the Buffalo Bulls in the last non- conference game of the season in this year's Homecoming game at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The Minutemen are having a highly-successful season so far playing with a much more balanced attack on offense and with a total team effort contributing in every one of their games.

UMass is 4-2 this season with a 3-1 record in the Yankee Conference as they ride atop the New England division. The Bulls will come into this game with a 5-2 mark.

Last season, at UB stadium, the Minutemen claimed the victory over the Bulls 33-9 behind two all-star performances by former running back Rene Ingoglia, the Minutemen's all- time leader rusher, with 148 yards and three TDs, and by senior Frank Allesio who racked up 172 yards and two TDs. Linebacker Justin Reimer recorded 21 sacks on the day.

The Bulls lead the overall series 4-2 over UMass which began back in 1964, and prior to last year's meeting, the two schools had not played since 1970. The last time Buffalo came to Alumni stadium was in 1969 when they defeated the Minutemen 16-6.

For the Minutemen, the word "Team" could not be defined any better than the players that make up this year's squad. Senior leadership has been outstanding and numerous freshman are already showing their presence on the squad now and in showing glimpses of the team in the future.

Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith has made the start the last two weeks and is showing good poise on the field and excellent athletic ability. He's a good scrambler with the football and passing this season, Smith is 24-56 for 366 yards, three TDs and only one interception.

As the newly-found passing attack is beginning to develop, the running game is not being an area of the game synonymous with UMass Football is not being compromised.

Senior Fullback Ron Brockington has been busting his way for good yardage all season with 376 yards on 67 carries and two TDs. Senior Frank Allesio, last year's Yankee Conference leading rusher, has battled a shoulder injury for a little while but has still managed to grab 288 yards on 70 carries.

Sophomore Matt Jordan leads the team in TDs with three, redshirt freshman Jamie Holston has a couple scores along with 100 yards on six carries, and sophomore Jim Pizano has contributed also, as he is third in rushing with two scores while capturing the longest run in UMass history (two weeks ago against Rhode Island with a 96 yard TD run).

The receivers are led by sophomore Doug Clark who leads the team in receptions with 10 and 247 yards and two TDs. As well as receiving Clark has been involved in a number of reverses running with the football, and overall averages 20.8 yards every time he touches the ball. Tight end Erik Henry has three TD grabs and is second in yards with 149.

The offensive line has been stellar again paving the way for the Minutemen as they balance things off in the air and well as on the ground. Every one of the five members has returned from last year, and it shows as they have only allowed 4 sacks in the last three games.

Defense has been one of the main keys for the Minutemen this season as well, as senior linebacker Justin Reimer leads the Yankee Conference in tackles, and sophomore Khari Samuel and senior Mike Dawson continue to punish the opposition.

Senior Co-captain Kory Blackwell leads the secondary into battle and freshman Jerard White has come on strong leading the team with two interceptions and 122 yards on kickoff returns.

Head coach Mike Hodges recorded his 30th win last week in UMass' 43-12 rout over the Boston University Terriers, and will be coaching the Minutemen in the last season of the Yankee Conference as it will be absorbed into the Atlantic 10 Conference next year. UMass has won 17 Yankee Conference Titles, more than any other team in the 50 year history

UMass has been playing with determination and a relentless pursuit in search of the last Yankee Conference title. This is a team with a lot of talent, experience, and oncoming ability with players stepping it up. After losing the first game of the season the Minutemen have come on to show that they are for real. Saturday's game will be even more special, with homecoming and the fact that UMass has not lost a homecoming game in Amherst since 1991.

Death toll still rising as fever sweeps India

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — Hospitals dragged extra beds into already crowded wards as the death toll in a dengue fever outbreak in New Delhi rose to 220 yesterday. The outbreak was beginning to spread to neighboring states, a news agency reported.

Five additional deaths and 388 more hospital admissions were reported in New Delhi since Saturday, Press Trust of India news agency said. More than 5,300 dengue cases have been reported in New Delhi since mid-August.

In addition, at least 10 people have died in the last week and 700 people were infected in Uttar Pradesh state, to the east of New Delhi.

And at least 22 people have died in neighboring Haryana state, the state's chief minister, Bansi Lal, was quoted by Hindu newspaper as saying.

Dengue is an infectious disease characterized by severe pain in the joints, fever and rash. The hemorrhagic version makes patients' blood vessels leak, sending them into shock if they aren't promptly treated with fluids. The disease is transmitted by mosquitoes. Poor sanitation and urban decay due to overcrowding have contributed to the spread of the disease this year in New Delhi, experts say.

Infant shot and killed in Tennessee drive-by

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — What began with a father's finger gesture at the car that swerved into his lane ended seconds later when a bullet crashed through his rear window and killed his 2-year-old son.

Donald Cherry Jr. died in a hospital Saturday from the gunshot wound he suffered as he sat in his child safety seat. A group of teenagers in a white sedan were being sought in the killing. "You don't think about your kids getting shot," said father Donald Cherry Sr. "There are no words to describe what happened."

Cherry said he was driving on a major Nashville thoroughfare Friday night when the teens' car pulled out wide from another road, causing Cherry to swerve.

"When I went around them, I flipped them off," said Cherry, 32.

The car then started to tailgate and Cherry hit his brakes several times. Within seconds, his rear window was shattered. "I thought I'd got rear-ended, but the back window was busted out," he said. "I turned around and saw my son bleeding." Cherry said if the teens are ever caught, they should be executed. "They took my baby away," he said.

Campaign UMass kicks off fund–raising

Alumni and private contributions boost hopes

COURTNEY SMITH /COLLEGIAN

Alumni showed great support at the Campaign UMass dinner, held in the Mullins Center last Thursday night.

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is part two of a two-part series featuring the significant financial contributions as well as student and Administrative reactions to the Campaign UMass.

Campaign UMass, which is a comprehensive campaign to raise $125 million from private sources for the University of Massachusetts, began last Thursday night at a black tie dinner at the William D. Mullins Center.

In his opening address, Judaic and Near Eastern Studies Professor Julius Lester said, "although the obvious objective of Campaign UMass is to Raise $125 million, Campaign UMass is also something more. As outlined by our Chancellor, David K. Scott, Campaign UMass is a visionary undertaking whose ultimate goal is to increase and enhance the University's contributions to the intellectual, political, economic, cultural and social life of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

$24 million already raised

It was announced that the Campaign has already raised $24 million to date through major gifts given to Campaign UMass.

Some of the contributions include:

• The General Electric Fund gift of $850,000 to revise the curriculum in undergraduate engineering.

• John "Jack" Smith, CEO of the General Motors Corp. and a graduate of the class of '60, funding a professorship in production management, to be implemented immediately.

• Robert Thimot, a graduate of the Class of '53, making a seven-figure commitment for scholarships.

• John Ross, a graduate of the Class of '48, establishing a series of testamentary trusts totaling nearly $1 million.

• The Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company setting up an endowment to fund tuition and scholarships for outstanding students from Springfield.

• Joe and Dorothy Gavin, Class of '43, initiating a $275,000 endowment to support the Center for the Family in the department of consumer studies.

Also, Alumni Association President Michael Morris announced a $1 million gift from the Alumni Association dedicated to fund the creation a new Alumni Center.

"The creation of an Alumni Center will make this great University even better," Morris said.

"The Alumni Association and friends of the University who have given principle gifts have set the stage for the very significant acquisitions yet to come," said Vice Chancellor for University Advancement Royster

Overcrowded SU at the core of new SGA expansion drive

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

In 1957, students, faculty and staff heralded the opening of the University of Massachusetts Student Union Building. It was created as a hub for student life on campus.

Thirty-nine years later, the Student Union is plagued by a lack of office space for student organizations, lack of meeting and programming space, and lack of space for student businesses to expand.

In response to the existing conditions, the UMass Student Government Association (SGA) has embarked on a Student Union Campaign to raise awareness for the need to build a new Student Union that will prepare students for the turn of the century.

The Student Union Campaign had its kick-off event in the Cape Cod Lounge, showcasing 40 Registered Student Organization for the alumni.

"The campaign gives students a chance to speak and connect with alumni," said Jason Vecchio, student coordinator for Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA). "We'd like to thank Chancellor Scott, and vice chancellors Robinson and Hedgepath for attending [the event] and showing us their support.

"I feel that the campus is ready to move forward towards a new Student Union."

This event is a part of a proposal for a renovated and expanded Student Union that includes a an advising center, a computer-video area, and distance learning and teleconferencing to enhance access to educational resources.

The proposal for the new addition also includes a new family center, additional meeting spaces and an employee credit union.

The RSO's present at the event included University Productions and Concerts and MASSPIRG.

In addition, the campaign organizers gave visiting alumni tours of the Student Union to show them the present conditions of the building.

> "I feel that the campus is ready to move forward towards a new Student Union."
> -Jason Vecchio

According to Aren Leekong, the student coordinator of the Student Union Campaign for SCERA, the purpose of the campaign is to educate the students and the alumni on the importance of the Student Union.

In its inception, the Student Union housed less than 15 student organizations, but with the increased student population at the University, the total number of student organizations has ballooned to 230.

Currently, the Student Union houses 66 of the 230 RSOs in 31 office spaces.

According to the SGA, one office houses five student organizations with total memberships totalling more than 500.

"I think it could be a positive thing," said Sarah Gillis, managing editor of the student art and literary magazine, Spectrum. "[The new Student Union] will fulfill the needs of the growing student body."

Scott supports Burn in IPO race controversy

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

At last Friday's Faculty Senate meeting, both Chancellor David K. Scott and Provost Patricia Crosson voiced their opinions and support for the International Programs Office (IPO) and its director, Barbara Burn.

Both Burn and her office come under fire recently following student claims of racism.

Scott and Crosson responded to the recent criticism of Burn and her controversial IPO memorandum, written by Burn and her staff, addressed to the Task Force on International Graduate Student Needs and Concerns. This report included official IPO comments to the Task Force's drafted report.

"[It's] not necessary to engage in uncivil types of dialogue, I have respect and admiration for what she [Burn] has achieved," Scott said, referring to last week's allotted five minute announcement by Graduate Student Senate (GSS) President Deepika Marya.

He added that Burn would accompany him and his wife to Taiwan to lobby alumni there for UMass' capital campaign.

Crosson, in addition to supporting Burn, called for a more careful screening of announcements at the Faculty Senate, referring the senate's last meeting on Oct. 3, where Marya expressed concerns about the IPO and harassment of international students.

"As far as the incivility of the comments... what about the incivility related to her [Burn's] comments regarding students of color?," said Marya, an international student from India. "And as far as the Provost's concern about what is allowed to be announced at a Senate meeting, are we talking about censorship?"

In a meeting between Scott and the Collegian earlier this month, Scott said that he had not read Burn's memorandum, but that he always disliked the use of the word "foreign" to describe people from outside the United States, saying that he preferred the word "international."

According to its memo, the IPO is not interested in hiring any staff of color, saying that in a diverse population, it is difficult to "satisfy or determine the needs" of those students "of color."

The document goes on to say that if the IPO were faced with a most-qualified applicant of color, they would hire that person even though that would be controversial.

The last comment in the memo says that the office objects to the interchangeable use of "foreign" and "international," saying that they are not the same and would make others confused if both words are used.

In an interview with the graduate newspaper The Voice, Burn said that office will continue to use the word "foreign" instead of international.

"...We are not committed one way or another. But see, I am an international person. You, [referring to Voice reporter Ali Mir] are a foreign person. International includes Americans and the term therefore is ambiguous," Burn said in the piece.

News Analysis

By continuously placing quotations around phrases such as "people of color," the IPO seems to be calling the very vocabulary of the words into question.

In addition to supporting the IPO, Crosson has also called for a stricter screening of regular announcements — a request that Marya calls censorship.

In a memorandum to Secretary of the Faculty Senate, John Bracey, Crosson said, "because Faculty Senate meetings have a certain standing within the campus community, and attract regular press coverage, the 'announcements' period lends a prominence to comments made within it that can easily be exploited."

Since it would obviously be politically damaging for Scott to be seen as championing an office which many students claim is chauvinistic, and equally damaging for Crosson to propose policies of censorship of controversial announcements at Faculty Senate meetings, the two highest ranking UMass administrators seem to have engaged themselves in news speak.

While he told the Collegian that he has always preferred the word "inter-

Scott addresses Faculty Senate

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Topics of discussion at the regular meeting of the Faculty Senate last Thursday ranged from the controversy concerning the International Programs Office (IPO) and its director Barbara Burn, to the inclusion of multiculturalism in the present Annual Faculty Report.

"It is not necessary to engage in uncivil types of dialogue," Chancellor David K. Scott said in defense of Burn in his opening address.

Scott was addressing dialogue which took place at the last faculty senate meeting concerning the conduct of Burn and the IPO.

"Throughout the world, she [Burn] is revered as a leader in International Studies," he said. "I have respect and admiration for what she has accomplished."

Burn has been criticized by the Graduate Student Senate President Deepika Marya for being unresponsive to the needs of international students.

"We need to respect Burn," Provost Patricia Crosson said. "She has served long and well as the Director of the International Programs Office."

Crosson also criticized Marya for for speaking at the last senate meeting "uncivilly."

"As for the Provost's concern about what is allowed to be announced at a senate meeting, are we talking about censorship? Is that the spirit of the Senate?" Marya said.

Scott also spoke of Campaign UMass, which began that night.

"This is a great day in the 133-year history of this Institution," he said.

Crosson addressed the issue of the use of multiculturalism in the current Annual Faculty Report (AFR).

Many faculty members have expressed concern over the lack of multiculturalism in the AFR, as well as the vague definition of multiculturalism.

"It is an issue which must be resolved on the bargaining table with the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP)," Scott said.

The MSP Executive Board issued a statement at the meeting, which read, "the MSP has always supported multicultural efforts on this campus. The administration brought to the negotiating table the proposal to include such a section on the Annual Faculty Report form. We did not perceive this as altering the three traditional criteria for evaluating faculty personnel, i.e. teaching research and service. We continue to encourage faculty to engage in activities that enhance multicultural efforts in their teaching, research and service."

In other matters, Deputy Chancellor Marcelette Williams informed the senate that NYNEX will be removing 105 paid telephone units from the campus because they are not profitable.

Student Reactions

Several students form the Student Government Association (SGA) were in attendance for the dinner.

The key initiatives of the campaign allocate $10 million out of the $125 million specifically for students to help fund financial aid and merit scholarships.

"We wish the number was higher," SGA President Maurice Caston said. "But the whole campaign is for students."

"We would like to see an increase in the number in order to keep this public university committed to staying affordable," said Secretary for Administrative Affairs Rob McDonald.

Other resources gained will fund key initiatives such as acquiring and retaining faculty, upkeep and expansion of buildings, research and library maintenance.

"The Campaign kick-off has gone quite well, Associate Speaker of the SGA Nathan Peyton said. "It has provided a wonderful opportunity for students to meet alumni, as well as recruiting advocates for the Student Union Campaign."

Student members of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) attended the dinner to distribute invitations to alumni for their Student Union Campaign.

The Student Union Campaign kicked off on Friday. The Campaign is a drive to raise funds in order to renovate and add to the current Student Union building.

"Our campaign will involve coalition building between RSOs (Registered Student Organizations) and alumni in order to create a new Student Union," SCERA Student Union Coordinator Melissa Grant said.

The Student Union Campaign involved an RSO fair featuring 40 organizations, a campaign presentation in the Cape Cod Lounge and informal tours of the Student Union.

national" to "foreign," Scott is still supporting Burn and an office which insists of describing people as "foreign." Scott has also failed to express any concern over the other controversial sections of the IPO memo.

While Crosson wants the Annual Faculty Report to address issues of multiculturalism, she still supports Burn and advocates for what student leadership calls censorship.

Regardless of what is said about multiculturalism, money may be a large factor. The chancellor said that Burn would accompany him to lobby alumni in Taiwan, one of the more wealthy countries in Asia.

The administration also appears more concerned about Burn's connections to a number of other governments, including the German government, and therefore may be more willing to overlook her allegedly anti-multicultural statements.

The provost's response to student concerns about these statements has been to call for stricter screening of Faculty Senate, because the senate attracts regular press coverage, and that time allotted for announcements can easily be "exploited," a vague justification.

Now underway, Campaign UMass — "to dream, to act, to lead" — may mean everything to the administration but improving the conditions and climate of people of color and international students on the UMass campus.

UM students well-represented at D.C. black/Jewish conference

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Tackling one of America's longest and most potent racial divides, 18 students and faculty members from the University of Massachusetts attended an African American/ Jewish conference in Washington D.C. over Columbus Day weekend.

UMass, along with 12 other colleges and universities nationwide, participated in this three day conference, hosted by Howard University and George Washington University.

The conference was planned in response to an increase of reported incidents of friction between the African American and Jewish communities last year on college campuses.

The goal, according to convention organizers, was to allow participants to gain a national perspective of black/Jewish relations. Participants examined and contrasted current programs on respective campuses created to enhance dialogue and ease tensions.

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter of the UMass Hillel House said the conference was very informative and "explored many issues about the difficulties of being a Rabbi of one community as well as trying to fit into a larger community."

Warren Blumenfeld, a doctoral student in the Social Justice Education program in the UMass School of Education program, said that the conference was had a lot of positive ideas to offer.

"The conference was very beneficial. It brought many colleges from across the country together. For me, the most beneficial part was the networking, it was nice to be in touch with other people who are building coalitions," he said.

Blumenfeld also commented on the discussions of a few of the workshops and panels.

"We talked about our concerns as a community. We also discussed many things that African Americans and Jewish people have in common, but acknowledged the fact that we have differences as well. We had frank and honest dialogue about our concerns," he said.

He, along with conference participant Lisa Robinson, will be teaching a two credit class through UMass focusing on issues concerning both African American and Jewish students. The class will take the form of a three day retreat on Nov. 8-10 in New Salem to discuss issues that concern both communities.

Robinson also said that the conference had many positive aspects.

"The conference was very interesting," she said. "It allowed students from around the country talk about what they do on their own campus and brain storm about ideas of what will work what will not work in terms of black/Jewish relationships."

Earlier this year, Blumenfeld and Robinson conducted a survey at UMass as a part of a class assignment which asked students for their opinions on African Americans and Jewish student relations.

"The conclusion was that on an individual level there is not a lot of tension but among the organizations on campus there has been tension between African American and Jewish leaders. We need to pull people together on a interpersonal level and then the tension can be eased," Blumenfeld said.

"I am aware of tensions in the past at UMass, this conference helped to get these groups communicate together more," Robinson added.

At the conference, UMass representatives spelled major initiatives of recent years designed to improve the relationships between black and Jewish students, faculty and staff.

Sixteen educational programs were developed before and after Minister Louis Farrakhan visited the UMass campus in April 1994.

During the summer of 1994, the Black/Jewish/Other Dialogue Group (BJOD) was formed. This group brought faculty and staff throughout the five college system to explore issues among themselves in hopes that these members could bring the discussion back to the undergraduates.

In addition, the BJOD formed a Video Dialogue project in which groups exchanged edited videotapes of group discussions to develop face-to-face dialogue between the two groups.

The Race Talks Forum was cited as well, undergraduate- initiated forum was held to discuss the issues of race, racism and other related issues.

"Many great suggestions made about programs to hold on campus were brought up at the conference," Perlmutter said.

Some ideas mentioned were to have both groups celebrate the African holiday Kwanza and the Jewish holiday Chanukah together, and to travel to the south to work on rebuilding burned churches.

"All in all the conference was a hopeful sign that people will continue to emerge in honest frank discussion... there are many people who are willing interested and desirous to form a coalition that will not only help the African American and Jewish community but everyone as a whole," Blumenfeld said.

"There was a lot of information packed into the two and half days. I would have liked to see more dialogue between the campuses... but I understand that this was only the first year," Robinson said.

Course strengthens relations

UM students use grant to focus on black/Jewish relations

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Warren Blumenfeld and Lisa Robinson, two University of Massachusetts doctoral students in the Social Justice Education program will be facilitating a two-credit education course, "African Americans and Jewish Students in Dialogue."

The class, focusing on African American and Jewish relationships, will be held on Nov 8-10 as a three-day retreat in New Salem at Bullard Farm.

Blumenfeld and Robinson decided to design the course after they conducted a survey as part of a class assignment which concluded that black/Jewish relations were problematic on campus.

"This course is not a beginning, it is a way of enhancing other programs on campus dealing with African American and Jewish and hopefully motivating students to bring dialogue both on and off campus," Blumenfeld said.

"The class will discuss the history and culture of each group. We will talk about personal experiences, and about what it is like to be a part of the group. We will discuss what is means to be black what it means to be Jewish," Robinson said.

She added that many students expressed a lack of knowledge in regards to the historical experience of African Americans and Jews in America.

However, "both groups expressed a deep interest in wanting to learn about each other's back ground," Robinson said.

"Students have a desire for there to be more dialogue between the two groups. This is an intensive way to help fill that need students expressed in a safe and equal environment," Blumenfeld said.

Much of the dialogue during the course will be filled with strategies on how to improve the relationships between these two groups on campus, he said.

Blumenfeld said that the most important goal of the course is that students "have fun while sharing culture."

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility gave Blumenfeld and Robinson a $1500 grant for the course. The money from this grant will be used to help pay for food, gas, transportation and for the class site.

Both Blumenfeld and Robinson said they hope that students from this class use what they learn to better campus relations by fostering a new and informative dialogue between African American and Jews at UMass.

Nat'l Chabad Houses to sponsor N.Y. conference on Jewish life

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

The second International Jewish Leadership Conference of University Students in Crown Heights, New York, will focus on emerging students in traditional Jewish culture.

Spots are still available for University of Massachusetts students to attend.

The conference, which will begin this Friday and run through Sunday, is sponsored by Chabad House on Campuses nationwide.

Yonah Blum, the program director for the Amherst Chabad House, said the weekend will consist of Shabat services, work shops, lectures and speakers.

Blum is arranging the trip to New York, and hopes to bring at least 20 students from UMass.

"The conference will focus on issues that deal with being Jewish on a college campus," Blum said.

Students will observe the Sabbath in Crown Heights, New York, the cultural and religious center of the Lubazitzh Hasidic movement. The Lubazitzh branch of Hasidism is named after its town of origin in Europe and focuses on an intellectual understanding of the Torah. Keren Peled, a senior at Hampshire College who attended the first conference last spring, described the event as "pegisha", meaning "Jewish journey."

Peled said students will spend the weekend living with a Hasidic family, but they will spend most of their time interacting with other students.

"For many people it is the first time they immersed in complete Torah observance," she said.

She stressed that the weekend is not meant to make less observant students feel out of place, but to introduce them to different aspects of the religion and culture.

Students will take part in informal lectures, because their is no writing permitted on the Sabbath. They will also have a mid-day meal with their host families. A good deal of the event will be integrated, but some meals will keep men and women separated. There will also be opportunities for students to take part in optional prayers.

Interested students should call Yonah Blum at 549-7855 to register for the trip.

What sort of homecoming?

Homecomings and Mike Burke have never gone well together. In high school, I was never elected homecoming queen (excuse: we didn't have a homecoming) and now in college, Mike Burke hasn't made the headlines of the Collegian for catching the game-winning pass to win the homecoming football game. Need an excuse? I probably don't even know where the stadium is — making it awfully hard to win a game.

What exactly is this homecoming? Who is coming home and why? Is it the equivalent of Thanksgiving for universities, where all the alumni can give thanks to their alma mater which gave them a diploma for years of partying? Or is it like Christmas with the alumni playing Santa Claus, giving the University large gifts of money to finance projects like perpetually cleaning up the campus pond.

Mike Burke

I don't know. In fact, I forgot we even had a homecoming weekend until a color photo of the UMass football stared me in the face in Friday's Collegian.

In my four years here at the University, I have paid about as much attention to Homecoming Weekend as I have to remembering the birthdays of all my friends in Whitmore.

Freshman year, I made an attempt to be filled with school spirit by attending a marching band concert (a.k.a. football game). Wow. It was so exciting, I have been going back for more every week — almost as fun as cheering on the equestrian team as they jump over logs to international stardom. I love UMass! Go… Go… Go UMass. Go…Go Go UMass.

I highly doubt that I am the only soul on this campus left in a daze concerning homecoming. If I don't partake in the homecoming activities when I'm at the University, why the hell would I return upon graduation for a weekend of boring UMass propaganda. Maybe we should move homecoming to the winter so we can watch the Three Point Boyz (Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso) kick some b-ball butt. I would return for that.

If homecoming is one of the administration's lead times for donations and contributions, mighty changes better be in hand. We must make homecoming more accessible to us, the current student body, because it is we who will one day "come home" on homecoming.

Two years ago there was a proposal of the Mullins Center hosting a rock concert that would appeal to both the current student population as well as the alumni. Imagine the overwhelming success if they got an artist like Neil Young, who appeals to virtually every age group born since the last World War.

This past weekend, the most exciting homecoming event was a giant pig roast on fraternity row. Wow. I wish I could have witnessed such a magnificent display of warmth and love by our friends, the fraternity brothers. The pig roast is just the latest example of how fraternities attempt to show their literary (and savage, barbaric) side by recreating scenes from the Lord of the Flies. After this column, I might well become their Piggy. I wouldn't be the first.

Homecoming should be transformed into a weekend where both the current student population and alumni can celebrate the greatness of UMass. We are a first-class university and have much more to be proud of — unfortunately most of us don't know what.

Apathy on this campus relating to University history must be at an all time high. How many UMass graduates can you name (that guy who bought you beer your freshman year doesn't count)? How many UMass presidents can you name (not including Hooker or any that have been involved with hookers)?

But seriously, this complete void of school spirit is not healthy. Aside from the recent success of the basketball team, UMass pride is dead. This spells grave financial trouble for the future of the school.

Look at Harvard, which is so financially endowed that it could fund a trip to Mars, hold graduation there, and still have money for a post-graduation cocktail party on the rings of Saturn. Why does Harvard have so much money? Over the years they have been the lucky recipients of countless donations from alumni.

Chancellor David K. Scott's Campaign UMass, which was kicked off this homecoming weekend, is a path heading in the right direction. In future years, let's hope we have a real homecoming — one that provokes us to give to preserve the future of the school.

Mike Burke is a Collegian columnist.

Not so well fare

Let's talk about something that's been a source of debate for quite some time now. Welfare. Some are, of course, totally for welfare, while others are more for a large scale welfare reform. As for me, I'd have to say I'm quite a bit for welfare reform.

However, my version of welfare reform is a little more extensive than most. I say get rid of it and use that money in other more beneficial programs. Programs that will, in the long run, help people more than welfare would.

Andrew Trodden

First, let's look a couple of reasons why people end up on welfare: unemployment, no jobs, no money. Single mother families— or more specifically— teenage single mothers.

To get rid of, or at least, limit the use of welfare, it seems rational to solve the aforementioned causes of welfare. I'm going to show you how it can be done.

First, allow me to say that desperate times are in need of desperate measures, and I plan to use those measures.

For starters, let's create the jobs. The government will take some of the welfare money and build the necessary buildings, then train a large portion of the welfare recipients to do the job. What job? You ask. Well I'll call it the Pregnancy Approval Commission (or PAC for short.) Basically, the PAC will take applications from people and determine whether or not they are fit to have a child.

I can just hear all the liberals sharpening their knives now. But look at it my way — I view bringing a child into the world in a dire situation like being on welfare or unemployed, or as a single mother, as actual abuse. The child gets no choice in the matter; they are dropped into poverty because some teenage mommy needs someone to love her. Boo hoo.

Under my system, this situation would be largely prevented, because she would never be accepted by the PAC. If she were to go ahead and have a child, the child would be taken away and put up for adoption. No questions asked. We could take it a little further and impose a fine or short jail term for this child abuser.

So the child gets adopted, as I'm sure there are many fit parents looking to adopt. They, of course, would as well have to apply with the PAC and, I almost forgot, pay the application fee. That fee goes to fund the PAC and pay the workers' salaries.

Maybe it seems a bit much to have an application fee. I don't think so, because if you can't pay the fee, then you sure as hell can't afford to have a child.

Let's see what I've done so far. I've created jobs, which of course, lowered the numbers of unemployment. I've redirected the welfare money into funding this project. I've slowed the rate of our increasing population, which needs to be done. And finally, I've prevented the unnecessary abuse of thousands, even millions, of innocent children.

Sure — there will be those still in need of welfare, but the numbers of them will be considerably lower. Thus, the government can allot larger amounts of money to those who really do need it. After all, that's why welfare payments are so low right now, because there are so many people on it.

Call me conservative, but I think it's time we all realized that there are a lot of people in this country and it is impossible to make all of them happy at once. So I realize that it sucks, but some people are going to get the short end of the stick. At least until things get better, and for that to happen, we have to change what we are doing now. Because the way we are going now, it will get worse long before it ever gets better. Maybe I'm selfish but I'd like to be alive to see the day when it is better for all of us. I bet you would too.

Letters to the Editor

Cheers for Dunn

To the editor:

I am writing to commend Bob Dunn on his editorial, "Keep Your Ads Off My Busses," which appeared in Thursday's Collegian. As a dedicated pro-choice activist, I was glad to learn that someone besides me is paying attention to what's being posted on the sides of our buses. Also, the reproductive freedom movement needs more people to vocalize support for woman's bodily autonomy— whether they are male or female. Thank you for taking a stand.

What's your holiday?

To the editor:

As I am sure, then rest has been and will continue to be addressed, I would like to address merely the first sentence of Erik Molitor's October 16, column "My Own View"and its implications. Molitor begins by informing his readers that Oct. 11 was Coming Out day "for gays, lesbians, and bisexuals." I was wondering if it was also Coming Out day for the author.

If not, was Oct. 14 Columbus Day for Molitor? Does Mr. Molitor have his own personal schedule of sanctioned holidays?

If October 11 is Coming Out day, for "gays, lesbians and bisexuals," is not December 25 Christmas for Christians? Maybe I, being a Jew, should have been going to school on Dec. 25 for the past fifteen years...

The issue Molitor raises in his article is whether or not his opinions as a heterosexual make him homophobic. I would say that his opinions do not make him homophobic, though his practices, such as giving other men hugs that are "brief, and never to close," may qualify him.However, I would say, Mr. Molitor, that your opinions domake you heterosexist. It is your heterosexism which gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and transgenders alike, as well as, many heterosexuals, find offensive and intolerable.

Opinion/Editorial

Understanding key to diffusing tension

Sitting in the George Washington University Hillel Auditorium on the first day of the Black-Jewish Relations on campus, it seems strange to look around.

A young black man with a shaved head is listening to civil rights activist Julian Bond, while right in front of him, a blond Jewish man wearing a yarmulke — a Jewish prayer cap — does the same.

The entire room is full of blacks and Jews, students, faculty and staff, all mixed together, working to find some way to improve relations between the two groups.

That first day, the two groups looked at the other group and at themselves, and spoke about what they liked and did not like about both peoples. By the end of the day, the 150 people at the conference had a better understanding of themselves and their partners, their historic similarities and their recent differences. The understanding reached here would help the groups relate and relax throughout the rest of the conference when sometimes offensive or painful things were said.

"Even though the campus has been relatively quiet over the last year, it does not mean it will stay that way."

Jacob W. Michaels

Unfortunately, those 150 people alone can't stop the tensions between the two groups. All blacks and Jews, especially young ones on campuses like the University of Massachusetts, need to get to know each other. Through that comes understanding of the other group, which helps lessen tensions between them.

For UMass, this means some work is needed, especially since none of the students that will be leading the two groups in the next few years were at the conference. The University, with the help of the student leaders from these groups, must work to set up pro-active events.

Perhaps the most important thing is for the leaders of the two groups to get to know each other at the start of the semester. A weekend retreat, done in the first month of school, could be a very important tool. Not only would the leaders get valuable experience for the rest of their lives, they can use the knowledge to be more sensitive to the needs and desires of the other group, thereby lessening tensions. The two can also try to work together on other mutual causes, whether it be voter registration, helping the homeless or stopping some random injustice on campus.

But just because student organizations, and not the regular students walking around on campus, are usually the source of the tension, they are not the only ones who need education. Regular students are the people who become leaders, so they must also learn about their counterparts.

The University should set up a class taught by two professors, one from the Afro-Am department and one from the Judaic studies department. The class, which would have many members of both groups, as well as other communities, should discuss the shared history of these two oppressed groups and what the future holds for them.

There are also other ways to promote understanding outside of the classroom. The arts are a great way to do so. One group of students at GW set up a program where a group of black and Jewish students went to see two plays, each dealing with the black and Jewish experiences. They then wrote and performed their own play about relations between the two groups.

Also, since both groups consistently have the highest percentage voting Democrat, there are obviously many issues on which they agree. The leadership of Hillel and the Black Student Union can and should set up programs like voter registration, cleaning up the campus, or helping out at a local soup kitchen. Not only are these important services to the community, but the students planning and participating will have the chance to get to know each other better.

Even though the campus has been relatively quiet over the last year, it does not mean it will stay that way. Tensions between the two different groups are likely to rise again. However, by achieving an understanding of who the other group is, perhaps they can be controlled and worked out through discussion, instead of having the mass protests and name-calling that have occurred in the past.

Jacob W. Michaels is a Collegian columnist.

Seeing beyond registration

Excuse me, would you like to register to vote?" the student behind a table in the Student Union said.

"No, I'm already registered, thank you," I responded the first time I was asked my freshman year. Now I am a senior, and these people are pushier than ever. Not only are they waiting to sign up students as they enter the Student Union to grab a bagel at the People's Market, or the Campus Center Concourse as students pick up the Collegian, but now they are harassing students as they enter the Bluewall for coffee.

Matthew Wurtzel

Making the situation worse was the MTV News Choose or Lose Bus. MTV makes registering to vote a game show experience. Students were enticed to register through free food and the possibility of freebies like T-shirts and CDs or even — perhaps to dream — to see their mugs on MTV. This is just wrong! I do not want to harp on a subject that other writers have beaten to death, but I question the wisdom of signing up people who are only interested in a circus or a free ride.

Since 18 to 21-year-olds were given the right to vote, the number of them turning up at the polls has continued to decline. There must be a link between low turn-out among young voters and these registration drives.

Sure, I think students should get involved in politics, but why must those involved students thrust their attitudes upon others who probably are not informed enough to make effective decisions. If student activists want to improve upon student involvement in politics, then they must educate rather than simply solicit student signatures.

Nowhere have I heard these students address education. When a young woman approached two students manning the registration table in the Bluewall, and asked them about how she could get information about candidates from her home district, I immediately looked up from my paper to listen to their response. Like this concerned young woman, I was also interested in finding out about the Congressional candidates in my district, the Seventh District of Massachusetts. The young man and woman behind the table looked at each other, and apologetically told the inquisitive young woman they did not know. However, they implored her to consider re-registering in the town of Amherst instead.

Now why would a student want to re-register in Amherst? Sure, we spend eight months of the year in this small rural town, but it is not our home. I still consider Framingham my hometown. Although in 1995, I spent a total of two months in my hometown, I still have an attachment to it that Amherst will never provide. I'm concerned about what goes on there. Don't get me wrong, I have some concerns for the town of Amherst, but only when they relate to the University and its students. The town of Amherst does not need a bunch of students who know little to nothing about the school system, trash collection, and other town services interfering with their politics.

However, I don't want to lay all the blame for the lack of political education upon the crusading student activists. Some blame falls upon this very newspaper. Since this is a state university, a little over 70 percent of the students are from Massachusetts and therefore are voters of this state. If most are already registered here, why doesn't the Collegian keep students informed about state politics in general rather than what Ahmadenberg is doing?

Sure, the Collegian runs stories about Governor Weld, and Senators Kerry and Kennedy, but when have you ever seen a roll call listing how state senators and representatives voted on important state issues — especially those pertaining to the University? In the time I have spent at this University, I have never seen this paper publish such data.

When I was a wet-behind-the-ears staff member during the election of 1994, I suggested to the News and Managing Editoss such a weekly listing on Mondays on the second page. The two scorned the idea. Their only defense was that it wouldn't help them — they were both from out of state. As the paper remains unchanged after two years, students remain ignorant as the 1996 election rolls around.

Since both the student activists and the local student press have failed interested voters, I'm going to help concerned students seek out the information about their candidates whether the district is in Massachusetts or Alaska. The first stop is the League of Women Voters. These people know it all when it comes to voting — I registered through them when I turned 18.

If they can't help you, try the Internet. There are tons of bipartisan web sites dedicated to informing voters rather than simply registering them. One site I find unbelievably helpful is Vote Smart at www.vote-smart.org. You do not even need to know your district when using Vote Smart. Just have your home zip code handy.

Forget about the free T-shirts and get the free information about your candidates instead. However, if you are going to register, do not register simply because it is the cool thing to do. Register to vote.

COURTNEY SMITH/COLLEGIAN
Shomwa Shamapande reawakens the spirit of the March.

One Year Later, the Spirit Continues

On Wednesday, the Black Student Union (BSU) held a forum in the Student Union Ballroom commemorating the first anniversary of the Million Man March.

The forum also served as a general meeting to introduce everyone to the new president of the BSU, Kenny Lacoste.

After the forum, the Hampshire Six Movie Theater held a private screening of Spike Lee's "Get on the Bus", a movie about the experience of the Million Man March.

The night began with senior Dan Lizana, the BSU advisor, who introduced the Vice Chancellor of Student Activities, Rick Townes.

Townes opened up the night by thanking SGA president Maurice Caston for funding the night's movie event. After a short speech about the themes of the March (atonement, abstinence, responsibility and reconciliation), he presented Lacoste.

Lacoste started off by reading a poem written by Richard Wright, "I Have Seen Black Hands." He then emphasized that the Million Man March alone wasn't enough to change people's lives.

"I don't think that one event can change a person's life overnight," he said. "I feel that the March was just a beginning to the work we have ahead of us."

Gregory H. Casimir

Dan Lizana took the podium next and spoke about the challenge of organization.

"The charter of BSU is to help black people," Lizana stated. "BSU is the mechanism, the tool, the vehicle that we need to get into."

Lizana also brought up the need for a support system between upperclassmen and underclassmen.

"How many upperclassmen have come to you [underclassmen] and asked you, 'How are your classes going?,'" he asked. "I assume few."

Lizana pointed out that in the spirit of the Million Man March, underclassmen had a right to challenge their leaders, as well as upperclassmen to maximize the most out of what UMass offers.

"If you are an underclassmen, I suggest that you not only challenge the organizations on campus, but the upperclassmen as well," he said.

Lizana also recounted his experience about a conference he went to at which UMass was recognized as a climate of education and political movement.

"These schools looked at us as if we had the answers to all their problems because they've heard of UMass, whether you know it or not," he said.

UMass, Lizana said, offers a unique perspective on social, political and economic problems that are only a microcosm of what goes on in the real world.

"You can take what you learn from this university as a black man, as a black woman, and apply it anywhere you go, and be successful," Lizana said.

Lizana ended by giving a brief history of his relationship with the night's guest speaker, UMass graduate and former BSU president, Shomwa Shamapande.

The spirit of the March

Wearing glasses and a conservative dark brown suit, Shamapande delivered a riveting and inspiring speech, garnering the attention of everyone in the Student Union Ballroom as soon as he began to speak.

He started off by telling a parable about a little boy and a bird. Shamapande used this parable to present his theme that the outcomes of our futures "are in our hands."

He questioned measuring the success of the March.

"I turned to the books of history and looked at the March of 1964," he said. "Why did people think that march was a success? It wasn't the eloquence of Dr. King, it wasn't the fact that 250,000 people showed up, which is only a fourth of the people that showed up last year.

"It was that in 1964, we had the Civil Rights Act, we had the Public Accommodations Bill, we had increased activism by the Student Nonviolence Coordinating Committee.

"What made the March successful wasn't what was said there, but the feeling that left that march where people went back and actually decided to change things in the world they lived in."

He then alluded to the parable to elucidate his point.

"The wise old woman would say that the success of the Million Man March lies in our hands, our collective ability to change the world we live in, because it is," he said.

Shamapande emphasized acting with a willingness to take criticism.

"If you're not willing to take the criticism, my solution to you is don't do anything, don't say anything, don't be anybody because if you do anything, you're going to receive criticism, and that's just real," he said.

Students rally in Campus Center

By Humphrey brown III
Collegian Staff

Students demonstrated on Friday outside of the University Store in an attempt to draw attention to an altercation between engineering major Pierre A. Elysee and University Store security.

The incident took place two weeks before the protest, Oct. 4, at about 4:00 p.m.

Elysee was in the University Store looking for medicine to take care of stomach pains he was having.

After he purchased the item, he discarded the receipt, but went back in to the store, remembering that he needed to purchase a toothbrush.

While in the University Store, he opened his packet of pills.

After purchasing a toothbrush, Elysee prepared to leave the store again, but was stopped by two University Store security people and taken to a back room, where he was accused of stealing.

"They told me that they saw me getting two tablets from a package, put them in my mouth, and put the package back on the shelf," Elysee wrote in a letter to Chancellor David K. Scott and a number of UMass Deans and departments.

Elysee confirmed that he did actually pay for the tablets by asking the cashier who checked him out, and showing the two security personnel the medicine package in his bookbag.

"I felt humiliated, angry, and frustrated being the only black person surrounded by at least eight white people and being falsely accused of stealing," Elysee said. "Never in my life have I been humiliated and degraded that way."

Elysee went back to the University Store on a couple of occasions, and noticed that he was continually being followed by the store's student security.

At the rally, Elysee shared this experience with a number of UMass students, and discovered that he was not the only one who has had difficulties with the University Store and the way it handles security.

What started out as about 10 protestors grew to include 40 to 50 students, holding signs and expressing their own individual anger.

"It's ridiculous that we have to go through this," sophomore Evelyn Aquinao said. "For those of you who doubt that this happens every single time we go into this store, go in with a student of color and see who gets followed first."

By the end of the rally, SGA President Maurice Caston stated that the University store had withdrawn its student security, but a deeper concern still pressed on.

"What we have here is a mind set of how we do things at UMass," Caston said. "And until we address that mind set, until we change it, until we change the minds of those in charge it's just gonna stay the same. So, even though the student security is gone, what are we gonna do about the insecurity?

"We, the students, have to be at the table writing that policy and not there as observers to what's going on. We have to take control of this situation, right now."

Immediately after the rally, Elysee, Caston and a number of students met with Vice Chancellor of the Administration of Finance Paul Page to deliberate the issues of discrimination against students of color at the University of Massachusetts.

Assistant Vice Chancellor for Campus Activities Rick Townes seemed confident that events such as student rallies and protests can actually bring about change.

"Students can make a difference; that's the whole point," he said. "That's exactly why students should get involved, because obviously students can have a difference and more importantly make a difference."

No University Store representatives was willing to comment publicly on the rally or the incident involving Elysee.

Black Love: Is it Reality or Fantasy?

Many of us dream of meeting our soul mate. The one that will make our experience on this earth pleasant and fruitful. Sistas dream of that successful, strong black man, who will love, honor, respect and give praise to his black queen. Brothas dream of that beautiful black woman he can trust, a woman who will understand his pain and give the nurturing love he deserves. Together they both would form a powerful entity of "Black Love." Is it merely a fantasy? Or is it available?

Onyinyechi Ihedigbo

You heard it in the songs of Marvin Gaye and Stevie Wonder during the '70s, when "love your brotha and sista" was the movement of the people.

Black Power was what voices rang.

Men used to brag singing, "Ain't no woman like the one I got."

Unfortunately, these love songs have been replaced with "Put it in your mouth" and "Freaking you is all I see."

The list of negative praises toward black man and women relationships goes on. All these images are being enforced through music, and activities such as Freak Nik, where women strip their cloths off and run around naked. At Greek Fest summer '96, men hold signs up grading which women have the flyest and skimpiest bathing suits. Some men take the initiative to strip them off, leaving them to stand and show themselves. Makes one wonder if Black Love still exists.

The truth is, it does exist. Remember the relationship between Whitley and Dwayne in the series "A Different World"? Remember the tenderness in their relationship? They used to overcome all types of odds confronting them. That's a good example of Black Love in a realistic manner. Let's think back to "The Cosby Show," when positive love was a shining in a household. It wasn't all a dream. How about the feelings you get when seeing a black couple walking down the street holding hands. That's Black Love. How about Grandma Helen and Grandpa Joe, who met fifty two years ago in college, and they are still together.

"When I was young, I was keen to the behavior of my older brothers towards their black girlfriends," UMass sophomore Magdalana Reis said. "They dogged them out. As I got older, I vowed never to date a black man. The stories my girlfriends told me of their situations made me stick closer to my decision. Then I met Malkum, who changed everything. He pursued me for six years before I finally gave in. Ever since then, he taught me that black men are capable of giving me love and respect. He makes me feel like the beautiful strong black woman I am."

Black Love is power.

Start respecting yourselves. Sistas stop exposing your legs to brothers who can't give you love. Love comes from ourselves and the creator. Brothers, don't just be hittin' it — that five ain't getting you anywhere, except making babies you can't afford to keep, so you run. You're giving all the good brothers a bad name.

"Black woman and men need to start educating themselves about each other's pain, so when things blow up there's an understanding between the two," senior Mac Johnson said.

We need to understand that we all deserve good things from this life, especially love. The kind of love that will allow us to grow and be fruitful. This love is not a dream.

Love ourselves, our blackness is beautiful.

It is full of power, capable of making change all around us, especially in our relationships.

Onyinyechi Ihedigbo is a Collegian Correspondent.

This letter has been drafted by some of the leaders of the ALANA Community. Those leaders, along with all of us at the Black Affairs desk, stand firm on the issues conferred in this letter and request that these problems be addressed.

Once again, the new academic year brings UMass the unique opportunity to exemplify its strong commitment to insuring an education for all. However, for many students of color, getting through this university successfully presents itself as a modern Odyssey.

For many of us, just being here is an achievement. Stereotypes and low opinion of our capabilities are hurdles we face daily in our pursuit of higher learning. While facing these issues, we must also be hopeful that this institution's administrators will see us as ones whose concerns are worth listening to.

Since the beginning of the semester, there has been much discussion and dialogue among students of color about a major course we all seem to be failing from the start — Whitmore 101. We are led to believe that we are welcomed here as students at the Univerisity of Massachusetts. Nothing seems to be further from the truth than the welcoming party that's going on presently. Nearly 30 percent of our community has been designated to the injured list because of their financial situation. The financially injured will soon be casualties and returned to their communities with their acceptance letter stuffed deeply into their ass.

This university has a goal to increase minority enrollment to 20 percent. Perhaps the Financial Aid office and the Bursar's office do not consider themselves part of the institution that has pledged to enroll and retain minorities. This goal of 20 percent will never reach culmination here at the University with students of color studying Whitmore tactics rather than their academic interests. There are major concerns about walking the tight rope between the Scylla and Charidbis also known as the Financial Aid office and the Bursar's office. In dealing with these two entities, students of color find themselves in an uphill battle.

The Financial Aid office seems to have a great talent for advising the students to do one thing and punishing them for not doing the other. Secondly, papers are mishandled and sometimes lost, all to the fault of the students and to the detriment of their aid package. It is as if the students are an additional hassle to dealing with the yellow, pink and white forms.

Then comes the chess master, the Bursar's office. This office would win a service medal if strategically placed in our Federal Government. Students have no say whatsoever. If you can pay "in full" you're in, if not, you're out. There is no in-between. For a student of color with complex and impoverished backgrounds, checkmate is called before the first move.

Also, coupled with the two instruments aforementioned is the institution's callous bureaucracy which places the cares of the students at a minimum to its own. The system, set up in this fashion, has created a giant sucking machine. A sucking machine which forcefully spits us out of the institution and back to our homes in shame.

We urge the University to act now and look into this matter with a mission to dismantle the system and disable this machine. Most importantly, we would like to see some leniency toward policies that demand payment, but not resolution. We also encourage an earnest effort toward working with students of color to chart a course toward our attainment of what we believe to be the basic foundation of peace, happiness, prosperity and all the things in existence — knowledge.

One Time For the Mind

Bell hooks always says that "Talking Back" is something that black women need to do in order to change what our speech content is known for.

Allana E. Todman

Although it's remarkable that many black women are often known for having both mother and father figure roles in the family, hooks says that when we are "Talking Back" as black women, we begin to see the need to be involved in political and social issues that affect us as black women in the black community.

Here at UMass, Lisa Scott, coordinator of the Women of Color program, is "Talking Back." With support groups here on campus for all women of color on health, violence and other programs like last semester's "Take Back the Night" march addressing violence against women, the Women of Color program is working very hard to combat any issues facing Black women at UMass.

Last Friday, Lisa Scott was asked by Zeta Phi Beta sorority to facilitate a forum of discussion where women of color on campus could bring up issues that face them.

"How is the unity on this campus, among women?" Scott asked the 20 women present.

One student commented that because of the body language that is present when people approach each other, there is always the preconceived notion that one of the two persons has an negative attitude.

In turn, everyone agreed that because of this, we as black women begin to learn or internalize the thought that when we pass each other we might as well stop saying hello, because usually there is no response.

This is one of the first ways that not only women, but black men as well, begin to internalize the idea that they have to wear that "face" of not acknowledging people, because they're afraid of the rejection, or they become "tired" of greeting people who give a silent response or a cold look.

As one student put it, "I've been here for more than four years and I know a lot of people here on campus, and if I said 'hi' to you all these years and by now you still haven't said 'hello,' I'm not even going to waste my time any more."

In the workshop, Scott helped students understand how to react or analyze what we should be thinking when we approach other women on campus.

We were reminded that often people are thinking of what they have to do, or taking those two minutes in the day to figure out where they are going. Scott reminded us that sometimes we can be our own worst enemy.

This is where two of the key words came up: confidence and self-esteem.

How do we see ourselves? How do others perceive us? What do we do when we don't feel good about ourselves? These were some of the questions that sparked discussion.

Without hesitation, women of color began to yell out, "We cry, we yell, we get depressed, we begin to lose our appearance (to this comment all the sisters nodded with a hmmm) lose our concentration, and we smoke and drink."

"It makes the problems go away, until we sober up," student Michelle Lemar said.

Scott replied by saying that we as black women need to be allies for one another. With this in mind, another key word came up — trust. No one knows whom to trust on this campus.

With such a transient environment on this campus, it's hard to develop an honest friendship.

Desiree, a student, said, "I'm a real honest and trustful person, and I would meet someone and we would be girls for that one semester, but the next semester we aren't even cool anymore and that person knows all of my personal information."

Here was yet another barrier and issue that women have to deal with.

Considering that there are about three women to each man, Scott gave the realization that this also divides us because women here are fighting over the men. Another problem that is included is that women don't know when they are involved in a healthy relationship.

The women of color that were present gave comments that stated:

You know you are in a healthy relationship when you are being respected, you can talk to him about anything, you both know what you want and you both have a clear sense of direction as well as a genuine interest in who the man is.

The climax of discussion came when women spoke about what happens when they are not in a healthy relationship and what some of the signals are for a women to realize she is not in a good relationship.

By looking at the man's physical actions and whether he abuses you verbally and/or mentally, are some signals that were given. Scott also informed us of "mantones," and how the deepness of a man's voice can at times be very intimidating.

"People don't decide that they want to be disrespected," Scott said.

She reiterated that, as women of color, we have to be allies to our sisters who are in bad relationships. Scott went on to say, "We all have a girlfriend, that's always going through drama, but we still love them because that's our girl for life."

There will be situations when we, as their friends, cannot do anything because, like drug addicts, it's only until the woman sees for herself that she is in a bad situation that any change will come.

Boundaries. This was the solution word that was given. In order for women to take self-responsibility, they have to set limitations and values to go by. Scott reminded us that it's only when we don't know how to cope with the after-effect of putting our foot down that we allow men to remove our boundaries and become disrespected. By maintaining our values, Scott reminded us that we can be in control of our drama.

Spoiling ourselves by getting our hair or nails done are some ways the women gave to help us pat ourselves on our backs after along day. Overall, the number one solution was that of spirituality.

"Make spirituality the way you live, and connect to the things that got you here." Scott said. "These are the things that are going to let you graduate from here."

MULTIBAND POPS
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
Oct. 18

The University of Massachusetts Music Department kicked off Homecoming Weekend Friday night in the Concert Hall with an impressive showcase of musical talent from over 500 student and faculty performers. The Multiband Pops concert played to a full house and featured 10 different performing groups, including the Minuteman Marching Band.

After two years at the Mullins Center, the Multiband Pops returned to the FAC concert hall this year for two evening performances. In attendance at the show were marching band alumni, Chancellor David K. Scott and UMass Alumni Association President Michael Morris.

The concert opened with a fanfare from University Herald Trumpeter Walter M. Chesnut. Chesnut then proceeded to conduct the Brass Choir in Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man." The piece was well–played by the choir, with warm and rich sounds from the trumpet line, punctuated by strong drums, lending an overwhelming stately and elegant feeling to the song.

The Brass Choir was followed by the Chapel Jazz Ensemble, directed by David Sporny, which played the Duke Ellington standard, "Caravan." The ensemble did a wonderful job capturing the flavor of the composition. The rhythm section was exceptionally good while saxophonist Brian Kearsley's clean solo won praise from the audience.

Another group that performed very well was the UMass Marimbas. Conducted by Peter H. Tanner, the group played "Farandole," a section of the L'Arlésienne Suite No.2 by George Bizet.

Other groups included in the first half of the concert was the Jazz Ensemble I, the a capella group 6 Minutes, the Percussion Ensemble, Wind Ensemble and the Vocal–Jazz and African Music Ensemble.

The last group to play before the intermission was the Symphony Band. Under the baton of Malcolm W. Rowell Jr., the band played "Elsa's Procession to the Cathedral," a playful and lighthearted selection from Wagner's Lohengrin.

The second half of the concert opened with the University Dancers. The dancers performed "Run," with music by Ronny Jordan and choreography by Billbob Brown. The dancers, dressed in a running clothes, used the "get–in–shape" theme as their inspiration for the dance.

The concert closed out with the Minuteman Marching Band. The band played selections from the 1996 Field Show, including a medley of Gloria Estefan tunes. The band's enthusiasm and exuberance as they were playing was remarkable. They swayed, shouted and, at times, chanted "Go UMass." After playing on the stage for a while, the band moved into the audience and stood among the rows, playing a tribute to band alumni in attendance as well as UMass's Alma mater.

After the show, Scott summed up the talent displayed at the performance by saying, "After seeing something like this, what other university would you want to be at?"

Holocaust event shares tragedy through song, moves Bowker audience

By Sarah Kimmel
Collegian Staff

"If we are to grow emotionally, intellectually and spiritually, we must open ourselves to the truth." These words by Professor Wayne Abercrombie set the mood for yesterday's "Music of the Holocaust Concert" held at Bowker Auditorium.

Behind the narrative of Professor Joshua Jacobson of Northeastern University, 70 voices came together in song to commemorate music composed during World War II. Members of The University Chamber Choir and Mahkela, the Jewish Community of Amherst Chorus, joined voices under the leadership of Abercrombie, Jacobson and Kayla Werlin, respectively.

Jacobson presented taped interviews with concentration camp survivors, as well as musical selections, in order to express the talents and courage of the prisoners. He incorporated fractions of live film footage from performances presented in the holding camps to display the music of that era. The most prominent holding camp was Terezin, a ghetto which housed Jews prior to shipping them to Auschwitz.

Much of the music of the Holocaust was preserved due to memorization and teaching by survivors. Jacobson profiled several Eastern European composers from the Holocaust, among these were Martin Rosenberg and Gideon Kline. Rosenberg wrote the adapted version of a Jewish death song entitled "Tsen Brider" (or "Ten Brothers.") The moving lyrics remind the listener of those who have died in the gas chamber and pleads to "not forget their names."

Kline's song was sung by the women of The University Chamber Choir. It is a morbid piece which conveys the knowledge that death is near. The composition was followed by an interview with Kline's sister, who said, "It is amazing that people can produce such pieces of beautiful music with all these atrocities going on around them." The music is a reminder that something beautiful can come out of even the ugliest occasions.

The most moving part of the afternoon was the final song, "Zol Shoyn Kumen Di ge'uleh." The combined choirs raised their voices in unity and supported Jacobson's solo with a shower of strength and hope. The message of the song is to never give up life and to never lose faith.

Through the power of music, voice and film, Jacobson captured the memory of the six million victims who perished in the Holocaust. It is through the beauty of art that it is possible to remember both their sorrow and their spirit.

Laine lights up FAC

The royal couple of jazz displays rapport

By Seema Gangatirkar

CLEO LAINE & THE JOHN DANKWORTH GROUP
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
Oct. 19

Cleo Laine and John Dankworth proved Saturday night that they are truly jazz royalty.

Backed by Dankworth's band, Laine and Dankworth opened up the Fine Arts Center's series with a performance that brought the audience to their feet.

Dankworth, accompanied by David Dunaway on bass, Jim Zimmerman on drums and Tommy James on keyboards, opened up the first set with "Mucho Gazpacho," composed by Zimmerman. "Mucho Gazpacho" was followed by a Dankworth original, "Moon Valley."

"Moon Valley" was an incredibly soothing tune, with a gentle piano in the background. Dankworth made the switch from alto saxophone to the soprano sax for a very mellow solo.

Laine made her appearance following "Moon Valley," singing the Gershwin classic, "I'm Biding My Time." Her deep and rich voice handled the song beautifully, while other songs in the set included Dankforth's "Why Would You Tell Me Why?," and a duet she had originally done with Mel Torme entitled "I Took A Trip On A Train and I Thought Of You."

After intermission, Dunaway took center stage with an Oscar Pettiford piece. Pettiford turned the bass into a solo instrument, and Dunaway's soloing was a credit to Pettiford's influence.

Following the Pettiford's piece, Dankworth soloed on "Autumn in New York," a blues song that evoked the mood of a cool, crisp day in a park. Laine rejoined the group in another season-related piece, "You Must Believe In Springtime."

The audience broke into applause when Laine started the Duke Ellington classic, "It Don't Mean A Thing (If It Ain't Got That Swing)." Laine was absolutely stunning on this song. Using her voice as another instrument, she and Dankforth alternated lines of music. She followed that up with another Ellington tune, "Creole Love Call."

Special mention ought to be made of the supporting group members. Both Dankforth and Laine took every opportunity to recognize Dunaway, Zimmerman and James. James, especially, did a great job on the piano, and Dunaway's skill on the bass was notable.

Dankforth is a very versatile musician, able to make the transitions easily between clarinet and the alto and soprano saxophones. His playing was extreme cleanly and fluidly, exuding warmth and fullness with every note.

The closeness between Laine and Dankforth stemmed from their long marriage and professional collaboration. The rapport between the couple lent a feeling of solidarity and cohesiveness to attain a degree of completeness in their music.

The concert blended together the very best elements in jazz, combining great vocal talent with smooth and rhythmic musical lines.

Hardships for Asians in gay community analyzed in Balcalzo's one-man play

I'M SORRY, BUT I DON'T SPEAK THE LANGUAGE
Stonewall Center
Oct. 17

Asian stereotypes in the gay community were explored in depth last Thursday night as artist Dan Balcalzo performed his one man play, "I'm Sorry, But I Don't Speak the Language," at the Hampden Theater on the University of Massachusetts campus. The performance was part of the Stonewall Center's Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender (GLBT) Cafe Series.

Balcalzo, a first generation Filipino-American, is a New York City–based performance artist.

The play was originally a work in progress being performed at various venues in New York City. Thursday night's performance was the first time it had been performed in its entirety.

A combination of both storytelling and dance, the performance rips through personal and cultural expectations, while Bacalzo plays out the autobiographical role with fervor and emotion. The hour–long performance followed the course of his life starting out as a youth in Kansas, focusing mainly on the aspect of his Asian queer identification.

As an Asian gay man, Bacalzo has felt prejudice from his gay white male counterparts. In his piece, it was apparent that Bacalzo always had trouble dealing with the racism that affected him in daily life. Throughout the performance, he constantly referred to the stereotypes associated with being anything other than a gay white male.

The movement aspect of the performance glided smoothly with Bacalzo's strong voice. Combining dance, he choreographed several scenes perfectly with the flow of his voice.

Bacalzo told various stories of his life throughout the piece, spending a good deal of time on one of his earliest experiences with a man. He told the story of a man that approached him in a gay bar and showed interest in him because of his "Asian look."

"I like my Asians to look like Asians, a lover once told me. What fantasy do I fulfill? Feminine, boyish, Oriental?," Bacalzo said in a rather cynical tone.

As the piece moved on, Bacalzo spoke of his parents and the troubles they encountered by having a gay son, explaining in a short dance sequence that he "doesn't understand why my parents won't tell their friends that I am gay." He spoke of how it feels to attend family functions and be asked if he has a girlfriend, a question that inevitably makes him wonder if he should tell the questioner that he has a boyfriend.

Since parents have a substantial impact on most people's lives, it's no wonder that Bacalzo's parents did as well. A great portion of his piece centered around his parents and he continued to speak of their inability to talk about his homosexuality.

The intensely moving performance ended with Bacalzo doing a rather traditional dance number to a piece of music that sounded like a cross between a Mexican mariachi band and Filipino folk music.

As the lights faded and Bacalzo exited the stage, the audience was informed that there would be a question and answer period with him. The small audience welcomed this opportunity to ask Bacalzo several questions not only pertaining to his piece, but his personal life as well.

Brothers McMullen highlights this week's HSCN choices

HCSN Preview by Frank Campailla

BED OF ROSES

Tons and tons of flowers is how Christian Slater tries to lure Mary Stewart Masterson to be the love of his life. The movie explores the characters well, but the two fall in love rather quickly without fully getting to know each other, which may put a dent in the realism for some. The story line has a few small, interesting parts, but on the whole is rather typical. Those who are not crazy about love stories will find it silly, while those who are will enjoy it. C+

SABRINA

Julia Ormond comes back from France looking more appealing than before to Harrison Ford and his brother, played by Greg Kinnear. Ormond wants true love from Kinnear, but may find it better coming from Ford. Ford's seriousness makes it seem as though he is acting in one of his action films. He does not give any spark to the movie, which lacks passion.C

THE BROTHERS MCMULLEN

This movie explores the lives of three Irish–American brothers who return to live together in the house they grew up in. Each one is having their own set of problems sorting through the triangle of women, love and religion while they look to each other for advice. The story surrounding each brother is realistic and has its own distinction which adds variety to the film. B

TWELVE MONKEYS

Bruce Willis is among the remaining few who have survived a deadly disease, and is sent to find the cause with the help of Madeline Stowe. The movie can be very confusing if not watched closely. Brad Pitt also stars and gives an excellent performance. C–

Volleyball splits two with GW & VaTech

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's volleyball team refused to let injured key players get them down, as they split a pair of home games at the Curry Hicks Cage this past weekend. The Minutewomen lost to George Washington on Friday night, but rebounded on Saturday to beat Virginia Tech.

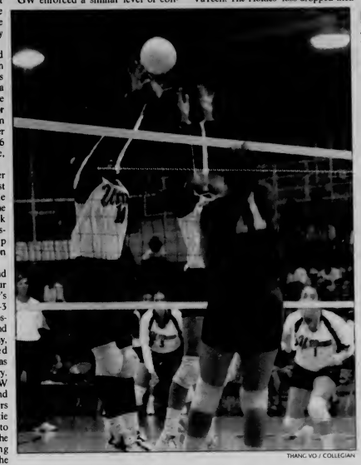
Massachusetts started the season 10–1, fielding a young, healthy squad. The lone injury in the early going was to freshman Amanda Flemming, who has seen no regular season action. Since that juncture, the Minutewomen have gone just 7–5, including their 6–4 conference campaign, which has just hit its halfway point.

The team can still be considered youthful, but healthy is the adjective in question. Coach Bonnie Kenny was forced to start three freshmen and a sophomore in Friday's match since the incidence of a stress fracture to junior starter Lesley Nolan's left foot. Nolan takes to the sidelines for the remainder of the season, bringing with her a .236 hitting percentage, 3.6 kills per game, and 3.3 digs per game.

Freshman Sarah Watters had her nose broken in the third game against George Washington, reducing the Minutewomen to zero substitutes on the bench. Watters replaced her icepack with a protective mask which she displayed proudly while putting up career–best number against VaTech on Saturday.

GW improved to 8–11 overall and 5–4 in the Atlantic 10 with its four game win over Massachusetts. Friday's visitors started the match with an 8–3 run in game one. The Colonials' imposing middle blockers Crystal Akens and Tai Bethune kept the home team at bay, forcing the short– handed Minutewomen to commit 12 errors as GW cruised to a 15–7 game one victory.

Game two started similarly — GW earned the immediate side out and quickly took a 5–0 lead. A Jill Meyers kill earned the possession for Katie Pearce, who served Massachusetts to 5–4. The Colonials were allowing the Minutewomen no slack, making another five point run to 10–4. The home team called time out, and the ensuing tactical change appeared to put senior outside hitter Dionne Nash into the center of the offense. Nash accounted for 7 of the team's 15 kills in game two. In spite of her performance, GW captured the hard–fought game 15–10.



The third and fourth games were both convincing wins, but unfortunately for the home team, one of them went to GW. UMass fought back harder in the third game, taking an early lead and preventing any substantial GW comebacks. Watters served an ace for game point, capping off a convincing win in game three 15–10. GW enforced a similar level of control over UMass in game four, taking the match with a 15–8 win.

Against VaTech, five players beat or tied personal bests as Massachusetts pulled out a five game home win. Pearce made the most notable mark, tying her own school record with 78 assists. Nash, Meyers and Watters all hit career–high numbers with 25, 22 and 17 kills, respectively. Kari Hogancamp rounded out the record setters with her high of 24 digs.

As a team the Minutewomen recorded 91 kills, just four short of the school record 95 set last year, also against VaTech. The Hokies' loss dropped their record to 10–11 overall, and 5–6 in the A–10.

With this weekend in the gaze of hindsight, the Minutewomen are left with a 17–6 record (6–4 A–10), and the difficult task of filling in the gaping hole left by the loss of Nolan. The junior will be back on the court next season, but until then the Minutewomen have senior Susan Maga as the lone reserve player on the sideline.

The Minutewomen's next game is home against nemesis Rhode Island on Friday at 7 p.m. Their last meeting was the opener of the conference schedule, and resulted in a Rams victory.

UMass blanks Explorers, guaranteed first in A–10

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

All season long, Massachusetts field hockey coach Pam Hixon has said that the road to the NCAA Tournament for the Minutewomen is through the Atlantic 10 conference.

Now, with one conference game remaining, the Minutewomen are guaranteed no worse than a tie for first place in the A–10s. They solidified their position with a 5–0 drubbing of La Salle on Saturday in Philadelphia.

With the win, No. 8 Massachusetts improves to 11–4 overall, 4–0 in the A–10.

After being shutout in the scoring department last weekend against Syracuse and Boston University, UMass brought out the heavy offensive artillery, as two Minutewomen scored a pair of goals apiece.

Senior All–American Kyle Rothenberger scored the only goal UMass needed, as she netted an unassisted tally to give UMass a 1–0 lead.

Freshman Saskia Fuchs contributed the first insurance goal of the afternoon, scoring an unassisted goal midway through the first half.

Junior Courtney MacLean put UMass ahead 3–0 in the second half, when she connected for an unassisted score of her own.

Rothenberger connected on a feed from Kate Putnam and Fuchs for her second goal of the day. That gave the Minutewomen a 4–0 advantage.

MacLean knocked her second goal of the day home to close out the Massachusetts scoring effort. She converted Melanie Gore's assist with only 40 seconds remaining in the contest to cap the offensive output.

In the UMass cage, senior goaltender Hilary Rose needed to make only one save to record her fifth shutout of the season. The shutout is also the second in a row, as the Minutewomen blanked Providence 1–0 last Thursday.

La Salle netminder Dori Shumadine stopped 15 shots for the Explorers.

The Minutewomen return to action Saturday at noon, when they travel to Storrs, Conn. to face Connecticut.

They close out the Atlantic 10 season Nov. 2 when they host St. Joseph's. A win over the Hawks would give UMass the regular season conference title.

Braves 12, Yankees 1

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Atlanta Braves showed the New York Yankees that what they saw on TV was no fluke.

Nineteen-year-old Andruw Jones homered twice and drove in five runs as John Smoltz and the Braves sent the Yankees to their worst World Series loss ever, 12-1 Sunday night in Game 1.

The Braves brutalized New York the same way they humbled St. Louis in winning the NL playoffs. The Yankees had a week off to watch Atlanta outscore the Cardinals 32-1 in the last three games. And now they know the defending champions are just as potent in person - despite a one-day rain delay, a three-hour traffic jam and jeering Yankees fans.

Jones hit a two-run homer off Andy Pettitte in the second inning, then lined a three-run shot off Brian Boehringer in the third that made it 8-0. By then Yankees fans, who had waited 15 hits for the Series, were already silent.

Game 2 will be Monday night. Greg Maddux, moved up a day because of the rain, will start for Atlanta against Jimmy Key.

On a day when the Yankees hoped to recapture some of their glory with their first Series appearance since 1981, Jones stuck it to them. By the sixth inning, with Atlanta ahead 12-1 and a light rain falling, many of the 56,365 fans had left.

Jones, who began the season as a member of the Class A Durham Bulls, became the youngest player to homer in the Series. He was a year younger than Mickey Mantle, who would have turned 65 on Sunday. Jones also was the first player to homer in his first two Series at-bats since Oakland's Gene Tenace in 1972. He was the first player to hit two homers in a game since Philadelphia's Lenny Dyktra in 1993.

Smoltz, meanwhile, was holding the Yankees hitless until Wade Boggs' RBI double with two outs in the fifth.

Smoltz improved to 4-0 in the postseason this year and 9-1 overall in 17 career starts in the postseason. The major league leader in wins and strikeouts this year, he left after six easy innings of two-hit ball.

Fred McGriff lined a home run off the foul pole in the fifth, and Jones started a three-run sixth with an infield hit, an odd play in which his bat broke and the barrel tangled up Boggs at third base.

Later in the inning, Marquis Grissom and Mark Lemke hit RBI singles and Chipper Jones had a sacrifice fly.

While routs were nothing new to the Braves — they routed St. Louis 14-0 in Game 5 and won 15-0 in Game 7 — the Yankees were not so used to such beatings.

The Yankees had played 186 previous games in World Series, most in history, but had never lost by more than eight runs. Certainly it never happened like this in the days of Joe DiMaggio, who threw out the ceremonial first ball. Helped by the Hall of Famer, the Yankees have won a record 22 championships.

her mark. Thompson was sparkling — the often overlooked back played perhaps the best match of her career, quelling several UConn opportunities.

UConn pushed through the UMass defense for its first strike 23:32 into the match when Ginny Woodward rifled a 17–yard shot to the lower left corner of the goal, which Dion knocked out, but right to an on–rushing Kerry Connors, who put it past the sprawled keeper for a 1–0 lead.

UMass was able to play reasonably even with a superior foe through the first half, with UConn holding just a 5–2 shot advantage at the break to accompany a 1–0 lead that nearly wasn't when Amy Powell fired a shot over UConn goalkeeper Sally Sakelaris, but off the cross bar, in the 42nd minute.

The Huskies cleared a trio of corner kicks in the final four minutes of the half to hold their slim edge.

The Minutewomen charged out of the gate for the second half, quickly pressuring Sakelaris.

In the 51st Minute, Emma Kurowski spun around a pair of UConn defenders and sent a cross to Tina Lightning, whose beaming shot went over the goal.

Dion, meanwhile, was brilliant in keeping her team in the match. Saves on a Woodward 12–yard shot in the 52nd minute, a Jennifer Tietjen free-kick in the 62nd, and especially a leaping save on Carabino, touching the ball over the net in the 81st minute, received a series of oohs and aahs from the surprisingly small UConn Soccer Stadium crowd of 732, along with cheers from the Fanatic Forty members who made the trip to enemy territory.

Another unusual aspect of the UMass game–plan involved forcing UConn to take the ball down the middle of the field, preventing Margaret Tietjen, and her identical twin sister, from making runs down the flank. this also succeeded, and helped hold the UConn lead at 1–0 until the 82:07 mark, when the speedy Carabino outraced Thompson to a long, looping pass from Connors, and broke in alone on Dion.

Offering UMass a taste of its own medicine, UConn coach Len Tsantiris pulled all 11 of his players back into the penalty area for a deep UMass free kick in the 85th minute, squelching the opportunity.

Despite the loss, Rudy was not down on his team, which played as well as it could against a formidable side.

"I'm disappointed in the result, but not in the players at all," Rudy said. "I'm very proud of the way they played. They took a difficult tactic and a difficult team and almost pulled it off."

UConn shutout UMass Saturday, but the same result is not expected today as the Minutewomen travel to the Bronx, N.Y. for an Atlantic 10 match against Fordham, a team UMass beat 7–0 last year.

times this season, and past seasons: the bunker defense.

Led by sophomore Amanda Thompson, the defense dropped back into a back–eight zone coverage system whenever the UConn offense would get even near the 30– yard mark. The team would drop in deeper, with constant communication between the back four and the front four so no balls could be served up and over. They had practiced that all week, as UConn had stretched them out last year in their 3–0 win in the 2nd Round of the NCAAs, while running UMass into the ground in that high pressure set.

It is a logical thing when you do not have the horses to keep up with Kentucky Derby–style speed, but it is still something a team needs to get adjusted to. Thompson has always been the stay–at–home defender for the four back set of UMass, and she shone on this day in weather conditions more suited for the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse.

"Coach told us to remember the humiliation we faced last year, and so I think all of us were pumped to play this game," Thompson said. "We played with a lot of emotion, and unfortunately we did not come out with a win, but we played as good as we could.

"Their forwards are really fast, and coach tried to have us play a new defense. I think we did it pretty well, but yeah, a couple of times they played through balls up and over, and their speed just killed us. I think we were prepared for that, but every once in a while they would get one through."

For Rudy, he knew it would be tough for his team to adjust to a different strategy, and was very content with their quick response to it.

"I'm disappointed in the result, but not in the players at all," Rudy said. "I'm very proud of the way they played. They took a difficult tactic and a difficult team and almost pulled it off."

career — and his fourth TD of the season.

Before and after Holston's 22–yard run, the Bulls twice cut the lead to 13 first on tailback Anthony Swan's (111 yards, 26 carries) 17–yard run, and then on a 17–yard pass from Rusin to Jamie Gasparre, but that would be as close as the Bulls would get, as the second run by Holston sealed the victory at 41–20.

The offensive line was very strong again, as it didn't give up a sack for the second straight week, and allowed the Minutemen ease in rushing the ball on the day, as Brockington had a career effort, leading all rushers with 120 yards on only 9 carries and one TD. Holston was next with 79 yards, then Smith with 59, Allesio with 52, and sophomore fullback Jim Pizano contributed with 20 yards.

"I think we gelled well," UMass center Matt Alegi said. "Before today [right guard] Ron Felice went down, talking about people stepping it up. Geoff Thomas played the whole game with his right arm strapped to his body, he couldn't pick up his right arm.

"You say the offensive line played well, I think we probably did play well, but we have five running backs that any time they have a tiny little hole, they can shoot through for a touchdown, and I think that's what's going well for our offense right now."

The Minutemen are improving each week, and this game saw them improve on two big areas that Hodges said that needed to be cleaned up since the beginning of the year, and those are penalties and turnovers. UMass was only flagged three times on the day for penalties totaling 20 yards, they threw no interceptions, but did lose two fumbles.

Defense was an area again that kept the Minutemen going as they continued to make the big plays as they sacked Buffalo's QB Rusin four times on the day for loses totaling 23 yards. Mike Dawson, Mike Batelli, John Sawyer and Jerone Alston were the ones in on the hits.

Speaking of making the hits, senior linebacker Justin Reimer continues to make the stops as he had 18 tackles on the afternoon, followed by sophomore Khari Samuel with 17, and senior Dawson with 14.

And how about another first for the Minutemen? Redshirt freshman Chris Price came up with his first interception of his career late in the fourth quarter to cap off an outstanding overall effort by the defense once again on Saturday.

"It's a very good feeling, we beat a good football team, and it wasn't easy," Hodges said. "We went out in the second half and played like we're capable of playing. Right now we're a pretty decent football team cause we're finding the way to get it done."

The Minutemen are atop the New England division in the Yankee Conference and are tracking down the best record in search of the crown, as they play the first of all–important games against four conference opponents to finish the year when they travel to New Hampshire this Saturday to take on the Wildcats.

■ teamwork

Samuel chipped in with 17 tackles of his own. Junior sparkplug Mike Dawson had 14 hits and a sack.

But there was also significant contribution from the front line. Senior defensive lineman John Sawyer registered the biggest hit of the day, sacking Buffalo quarterback Eric Rusin on a fourth and nine with 8:22 left in the fourth quarter, which gave the ball back to UMass and killed a Bull drive. The Minutemen scored on the subsequent drive, on Holston's first of two touchdowns, and the 33–14 lead put away any chance of a Bull comeback.

"When we execute, big things happen." Samuel said.

Buffalo head coach Craig Cirbus praised the Minutemen's effort.

"They made it look easy today," Cirbus said. "We lacked mental concentration on plays we practice over and over again. That, combined with a well tuned and well prepared UMass squad, it was doomsday for us".

With Frank Alessio hobbled by various injuries all year, from ankle to shoulder to rib problems, and with Matt Jordan's hamstring problems sidelining him early in the year, the Minutemen have gotten a few "unsung heroes" to step it up.

Brockington heads this list. After two injury–plagued seasons, Brock is healthy again, and leads the team in rushing with 496 yards. The freshman Holston, who the Minutemen coaching staff had hoped would be a star somewhere down the line, has paid immediate dividends. On only 16 carries this season, Holston has gained 179 yards and four touchdowns, averaging a score once every four times he touches the ball. Pizano, a sophomore tailback, has played well when called upon, with 203 yards and two touchdowns, including the longest run in UMass history, a 96–yard jaunt against Rhode Island.

After seven games, the Minutemen are 5–2, and comfortably nestled in first place in the Yankee Conference's New England Division. But the rest of the schedule is tricky, starting with next Saturday's battle with New Hampshire up in Durham. UNH is, at least right now, the main competition with Minutemen for the N.E. division crown, and Saturday's showdown with the Wildcats looms as the biggest game of the year.

"The road ahead is Saturday vs. UNH," Smith said. "We have to take this one game at a time."

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20
Don't allow a disagreement to fester this week. The longer it lasts, the more the other person will gain the advantage. An early compromise is best. Major purchases require extra attention to details, or you could miss some vital fine print.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
Now that you've checked out all your options, go ahead and make a decision. Your instincts are pretty good. Don't try to mix business and pleasure this week, or you'll end up feeling shortchanged in both.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
A reluctant companion threatens to ruin a pleasant outing. Don't force the issue. Instead, change the subject and enjoy a lively conversation. Concentrate on domestic issues by starting a new family tradition.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
A simple conversation turns ugly when egos are at stake. Steer clear of emotional comments to keep things from getting out of hand. Suggest a distraction at work to break out of a stale routine.

LEO
July 23–August 23
An emotional commitment begins to flower, so nourish it with a thoughtful, romantic gesture. Do not mistake silence for assent at work—you may need to work harder to ferret out objections to a plan you've made.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22
A shopping spree could get out of hand this week, so leave your plastic at home. During a meeting or discussion you may need to ask more questions than usual to be certain you understand everything.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
To feel good, it's important to look good, so treat yourself to a little luxury. Your charm is running high, so schedule activities that will take advantage of this. You might even consider asking for a raise, but be graceful if it doesn't happen.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
The pressure of a deadline begins to encroach upon your peace of mind. Delegate the responsibility, and you'll accomplish more than you would have alone. Honesty is the best policy, especially when it comes to an intimate relationship.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
Your organizational talents shine this week, so take on extra responsibilities, especially if you need to make a good impression. You're full of great ideas—just think of a way to get the word out.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
Don't follow suggestions blindly, especially where large sums of money are concerned. You need to find the solution that's right for you. Enjoy a leisurely outing with an old friend.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18
Anticipation is your best ally as you navigate your way through a simple encounter. Plan ahead, and you'll stay on top of things as the situation suddenly becomes complicated. A labor-saving idea offers more trouble than it's worth.

PISCES
February 19–March 20
Avoid getting bogged down in details, especially as the weekend approaches. Your clear vision and enthusiasm will be needed to supply energy for a group discussion.

Minutemen baffle Buffalo in homecoming victory

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

Homecoming weekend is always an exciting time of the year, and for the fifth straight season the University of Massachusetts football team has joined in on that excitement, as this past Saturday they defeated the Buffalo Bulls 41–20 at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

BUFFALO 20

An overcast and chilly afternoon certainly did not hinder the Alumni and fans enjoying their pregame tailgating parties, nor did it have an effect on the Minutemen. UMass, which entered its last non-conference game of the year, were victorious as they improved their overall record to 5–2, before getting set to take their 3–1 conference record into battle to finish the year with the six conference opponents.

This was a game that saw many firsts achieved by different players on this UMass squad. What has not been a first is that this is what UMass has been accustomed to seeing all year where there is always somebody new putting forth the performance to help this team achieve success.

"It's kind of like a total team thing I think for us," Minutemen coach Mike Hodges said. "Everybody made a huge contribution every which way as far as winning the football game, and we made some big plays both offensively and defensively."

When each player can go out and perform to the best of their abilities at what they do, you have good individual performances. Put all those performances together and you have the reason why UMass is on a roll this year. Words such as selfishness, egotism and one-man team have had no place in UMass football this season and it shows.

On the second drive of the game the Minutemen struck first, going six plays for 85 yards in 2:06 seconds for the score. Speaking of firsts, this drive saw freshman wideout Ralphael Quinn come down with his first reception of the year, when the Orlando, Fl native ran for a 20-yard gain as UMass drove down the field. To cap things off, the first rushing touchdown of the season for senior tailback Frank Allesio arrived, as he broke it out for a 19-yard score.

After half-time the Minutemen were ahead 14–7, as senior fullback Ron Brockington, the team's leading rusher, continued to dominate, as he ran straight up the middle for a 68-yard touchdown run midway through the second quarter for the second UMass score and the longest run of his career.

The Bulls scored right before the half keeping it to a seven point advantage as quarterback Erik Rusin threw a 21-yard TD pass to Drew Haddad for the score. Rusin was 15 for 29 on the day with 195 yards and 2 TDs. Haddad was the prime target, as he hauled in six catches for 111 yards and the one TD.

After the half–time show, which featured former members of the Massachusetts Marching Band, the Minutemen came out with the same spark to own the third quarter. They scored twice to jump out to a 27–7 lead.

UMass freshman quarterback Jeff Smith connected to tight end Erik Henry for 34 yards down to the Buffalo 26 yard line. Five plays later, out of the power I formation (three running backs), the Minutemen would connect on the play that has worked well for them this season, faking the run while Smith found tight end Kerry Taylor rolling out to the right corner of the endzone for his first touchdown of the season.

A minute and a half later, senior cornerback Leggie Beckford picked off his second interception of the season and returned it 14 yards to the Buffalo 21 yard line. That would set up another score, this time as sophomore tailback Matt Jordan took the pitch out to the right side for the TD, making it 27–7 after the missed extra point.

On the afternoon, the Minutemen held the ball for seven minutes less than Buffalo, and the total yardage of both teams was virtually the same with the Minutemen amassing 397 yards to the Bulls 388. UMass got it done on the ground with 321 yards, while Buffalo had a little over half their yardage come through the air, with 195 yards.

Smith threw for 76 yards on the day with 6 for 13 passing and one TD, and continued to scramble well, going all out and lowering the shoulder on numerous runs, picking up a total of 59 yards on 13 carries.

The fourth quarter saw another running back for UMass put his mark in this homecoming victory, as red-shirt freshman Jamie Holston flew by the defense up the middle on two counts for touchdowns, the first on a 22–yard score, and the next on a 47–yard rumble — the longest of his

Teamwork at the heart of the UMass game plan

By Luke Meredith

With alumni and students reveling in the parking lot festivities that highlight Homecoming weekend — traditionally the best tailgating weekend of the year — you would think that Warren G. McGuirk Stadium would have been packed Saturday for the Massachusetts–Buffalo game. This was not the case.

After a crowd of over 15,000 last week, only 8,819 made the journey into the stadium, leaving many to wonder whether the game should have been moved to the parking lot to accommodate the fans. But for those of you who missed the game, start kicking yourselves now, because you missed a good football game.

Playing perhaps its best football to date, Massachusetts out-hustled, out-worked and out-played the University of Buffalo, whipping the Bulls 41–20. All the elements were there. The offense was clicking, especially in the second half, and the defense put in yet another solid effort. It appears that the Minutemen have really begun to gel as a football team, and even the normally cautious UMass coach Mike Hodges had to admit that things are going well for the Minutemen.

"You have to find ways to get things done when they need to get done, and we did that today," Hodges said. "We're a pretty decent football team, because we're finding ways to get it done. Everyone had a contribution [today]."

Saturday's win was a team effort. Five different Minutemen scored, and four players had over 50 yards rushing, led by senior fullback Ron Brockington's 120 yards and freshman fullback Jaime Holston's two touchdowns, including a 22–yard scamper with 4:36 left in the fourth quarter that broke the Bulls back. Freshman Jeff Smith put in another good effort behind center, going 6–13 for 76 yards, with a beautiful play–action rollout two–yard touchdown pass to tight end Kerry Taylor midway through the third quarter that proved to be the game–winning score.

As far as the scoring went, UMass had its success straight up the middle. Ron Brockington had a 68–yard touchdown run that was up the middle, and both of Holston's TD's, including a 47–yard sprint with 1:07 left in the game, were right up the belly of the Bull defense.

"They came in thinking of stopping [Frank] Alessio, [Matt] Jordan and [Jim] Pizano outside, but they didn't think about the inside," Hodges said.

Defensively, it was a theme that is beginning to sound a bit redundant in Amherst, but it's a type of redundancy Hodges will take any day of the week. Once again, the Minuteman linebacking core was everywhere on Saturday.

Senior All–American candidate Justin Reimer had 18 tackles, giving him 95 tackles in only seven games, and sophomore standout Khari

UM falls in Storrs showdown

By Leigh Torbin

STORRS, Conn. — No matter what changes No. 11 Massachusetts (10–2–1) women's soccer coach Jim Rudy attempts this year, nothing will be able to fill the rift in his team's midfield left by the loss of two–time All–American Rebecca Myers to a knee injury two weeks ago.

CONNECTICUT 2
MASSACHUSETTS 0

Facing its toughest challenge of the season, No. 4 Connecticut (15–1) on the road, in a must–win (or at least show) situation in terms of regional rankings for the NCAAs, UMass radically shifted its tactics. The Minutewomen hoped to contain the high–powered Husky attack which broke the school record for goals in a season on Saturday, with still a month left in the season.

UConn simply annihilated UMass last year in the NCAAs, using its 4 team squad to down the Minutewomen 3–0, in a contest that UMass was never in from the opening whistle.

With that loss in mind, and without Myers, it is easy to understand why a team ranked 11th would be so happy after a 2–0 loss on Saturday. Until the 82:07 mark, when Jana Carabino scored against a UMass team thinking offense, the score was 1–0 and UMass had several chances to pull even.

If a tie is supposed to be like kissing your sister, one here would have been like kissing a supermodel.

Amidst howling winds, the Minutewomen averted from their trademark possession–oriented ball control offense, and instead of focused on defense, keeping nine players within their own penalty area at all times.

UMass conceded everything up to 25 yards out from goal, but went to war with trenches and barbed wire once UConn tried to advance further. The Minutewomen found great success with their new tactic and mind–set as it made its debut on Saturday.

"For every game this year we were on the [offensive] side of the field, and here's one game where we had to change everything and convince [our team] that this is the way to play," Rudy said. "I was very pleased with our performance and a new tactic against a great team and it almost worked."

The Huskies were able to pressure goalkeeper Danille Dion, forcing her to make several acrobatic saves, far more than her usual amount. Dion hadn't been as busy as she was on Saturday since last year's game at UConn.

The pressure on the Atlanta native would have been far greater had sweeper back Amanda Thompson been off

UMass soccer can't run with the dogs

By Jorma Kansanen

STORRS, Conn. — Where the campus of the University of Connecticut is located, it is commonplace to see such things as bumper stickers saying "a woman's place is on a horse," especially in this loist corner of the state.

Last Saturday afternoon at Storrs, though, the No. 11 Massachusetts women's soccer team (10–2–1) were the ones who lost, as they faced a group of thoroughbreds in the No. 4 Huskies (15–1). The superior speed of the horse squad out– run, but did not necessarily out–play, the Minutewomen, as they were able to ride a first half score by senior forward Kerry Connors to an eventual 2–0 win.

If speed hurts, than this contest was a night's grounding with no television and no supper for the Minutewomen. From top to bottom, the UMass lineup is technically sound. But even with experienced players like seniors Tina Lightning and Sandy Shimogaki, who can deftly move the ball upfield in a matter of seconds, a side like UConn does not even give you that much time. They are all over you before you can even say "olé."

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, he sees the Huskies as one of the quickest sides he has ever witnessed. But not just on one side of the pitch — on all sides.

"Their team speed is the fastest I have ever seen," Rudy said. "A lot of people think their attack is their best part. I sort of disagree, I think their best part is their defense.

"It is so good, and you can't hit through balls, and when you try to combine, they are all over you. They shut the space down, they double up all over you."

The substitution of freshman forward Kate Webb (3 goals, 6 points) in the last half of the two frames appeared to spark the UMass offense, as the Jana Carabino–esque speed and hustle of the Longmeadow native went step–for–step with the quick back line of the Huskies.

But that defense, led this day by junior Sara Whalen and freshman Carey Dorn, shut down any runs by Webb and her front line mate in freshman Emma Kurowski (7 g, 4 a, 18 pts). If they ever had a inch on Whalen, Dorn or sophomore Christy McCann, that supposed mile would be immediately tracked down and mercilessly defended.

The real Carabino, the UConn junior forward (10 g, 6 a, 26 pts), officially ended the game, as her one–on–one with junior keeper Danielle Dion was as academic as you can get. Connors dropped a pass down the center of the midfield, and down the stretch Carabino came, making the final score of 2–0 with a shot from 15 yards out.

That was a surprise goal, especially when you consider the defensive tactics of the Minutewomen. They were looking to employ a "crescent moon" style of system, as UMass wanted to push the Huskies off the flanks into the center of the field in an attempt to keep them from running balls into the box, and packing the team in their own end. Shimogaki and senior midfielder Amy Powell had success at this tactic most of the day, as the flanking Tietjen twins, Jennifer and Margaret, were rendered ineffectual.

After the game, Rudy was both satisfied with his midfield and defense, and astonished at the playmaking qualities of the Willington, Connecticut native.

"We wanted to push them into the center, and we did that fairly well, which made for a good goal even more remarkable, because they beat it down the center," Rudy said. "[Carabino] finds a way. Last year she danced through the mud, coated us in the mud, and today she got that little run, and I have sort of come to expect that."

Another tactic by Rudy to battle the speed of UConn was something that he has seen done to his team a number of

UM shutout by Fordham, no longer tied with Rams

It's crunch time for the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

The Minutemen took to the road this weekend to prove to the conference that they deserve a spot in the postseason. Entering the weekend tied for fourth place with Fordham, a pair of wins over the Rams and No. 3 LaSalle would boost their chances at remaining on the pitch at the end of the regular season.

The Minutemen (7–5–1, 4–3–1 A–10) did not fare fell in the Bronx, dropping their first match of the weekend to Fordham (7–6–1, 5–1–0 A–10) on Friday.

The UMass offense peppered the Rams, outshooting their hosts 29–22 while tallying six cornerkicks on the day, but couldn't muster a goal.

Fordham lit up the board for the first time when Harris Tsangaris collected a loose ball in the box and sent one past sophomore goalkeeper Jeff Jablonski from 10 yards out 8:20 into the game. The Rams scored their second goal later in the first frame, when Sal Leanti made good on a penalty kick.

The Minutemen kept the Fordham keepers busy as netminders Devin Moore and James Grandinetti combined for 17 saves on the day. Moore played the first 17 minutes of the match making six saves before leaving the game with an injury. Grandinetti took to the pitch and went the distance for 11 saves and the shutout.

In the goal for UMass, Jablonski stopped eight shots but the Minutemen could not turn things around on the other half of the field.

This loss put a greater emphasis on yesterday's match against LaSalle in Philadelphia. Going into the weekend, the Explorers were the only undefeated squad in the A–10 with a record of 5–0–1 and an overall mark of 9–1–1. Led by a player UMass coach Sam Koch cited as a potential Major League Soccer star after his tenure at LaSalle, Cesidio Colasante, the Explorers proved to be a force to be reckoned with.

Results of yesterday's match were not available at press time. Catch tomorrow's Collegian to see how the Minutemen fared in Philly.

Nobel Peace winner banned by Philippines

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — Philippine authorities yesterday banned Nobel Peace Prize winner Jose Ramos-Horta from entering the country.

The ban stems from a directive by President Fidel Ramos denying entry to all foreigners who might disrupt the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit, immigration Commissioner Edgar Mendoza said. "We have no choice but to ban Horta and other foreigners whose presence here could endanger our national security," he said. Ramos-Horta, a resistance leader from East Timor who opposes Indonesia's annexation of that territory, was named the joint winner of this year's Peace Prize with East Timor's Roman Catholic bishop, Carlos Felipe Ximenes Belo.

President Suharto of Indonesia is among 18 leaders scheduled to attend the economic summit, known as APEC, beginning Nov. 25 in Manila.

Ramos-Horta had been scheduled to address the Nov. 22 opening of the People's Forum on APEC, a gathering of 400 delegates from the Philippines and other countries, including the United States and Japan.

The forum opposes APEC's efforts to establish free trade in the region, arguing that such a policy would hurt poorer countries whose industries cannot compete in the global market.

FBI shoots man dead following bomb threat

STEVENSON, Wash. (AP) — A man suspected of making a tape-recorded threat to blow up the Bonneville Dam later showed up at the federal dam with a gun and was shot to death by an FBI agent, authorities said.

No explosives were found at the dam, said Diana Brimhall, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, operator of the sprawling hydropower installation on the Columbia River along the Oregon-Washington state line.

Special agent Ray Lauer in Seattle identified the dead man as Nathaniel Milligan, 20, of Skamania County. Milligan tried to extort $15,000 from the government by threatening to blow the dam up, Lauer said.

He was shot twice as he approached authorities with a rifle in one hand and what he said was a detonator in the other, Lauer said. The bomb threat was found about 4 p.m. Sunday on a tape recorder near a telephone at the visitor center on the Washington side of the dam, Brimhall said.

The tape recorder had a sign on it that said "play me" or "listen to this," Brimhall said. The tape included demands as well as a bomb threat, she said.

Authorities evacuated about 15 people working at the visitor center and at the adjacent powerhouse No. 2 and warned fishermen away from the dam.

Officers were fairly confident that Milligan was the person who had left the taped threat, based on things he said before he was shot, Brimhall said. He was not familiar to those who work at the dam, she said.

UM Police respond to window problems

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

Recent reports of potentially lethal objects being thrown from residence hall windows have University of Massachusetts Police in search of new preventative methods.

Deputy Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said that while this type of potentially dangerous behavior is not new and has not witnessed a recent dramatic increase, it is a problem that is not going away.

"In my 14 years here, I've seen a number of students who think they are doing something fun at the time, and it winds up in tragedy," O'Connor said.

The most recent event that brought this issue to the forefront of many police officers' minds was the incident in in which a cinder block was thrown out of a window of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall on Sept. 16.

The cinder block shattered when it hit the ground, and parts of it broke a window. No one was injured. The police were not able to determine where it was thrown from and have no suspects.

"Throwing a cinder block out of a window has the potential to seriously injure, or even kill someone," O'Connor said.

In addition to the cinder block, O'Connor has documented some of the most serious cases from this semester and from the spring semester of last year.

On Sept. 8, glass was broken in Van Meter Residence hall, fire-works and bottles went out of the window, striking cars.

On April 22, a balloon full of water was thrown from a window of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall, striking and breaking the windshield of a vehicle. The female inside the vehicle reported glass hitting her eye.

These types of reports are plentiful in numbers, and go back for several years, according to O'Connor.

O'Connor said that one of her associates came across a Collegian from 1977 which contained an article about the same problem of dangerous objects being tossed out of residence hall windows.

More recently, on Friday night, an individual reported being struck by objects thrown from McNamara Residence Hall. On Sunday, an individual was almost hit by a glass object thrown from Cashin Residence Hall.

"Property damage is one thing," O'Connor said. "What I want to do is get the word out that students are going to hurt somebody."

According to O'Connor, whenever an incident occurs police attempt to identify the room and floor where the object came from, and go up and have a conversation with the suspect.

O'Connor also stressed that students can be criminally charged with malicious destruction of property. If the damage exceeds $250 it is a felony, otherwise, it is a misdemeanor charge.

In the event that an object should kill someone, O'Connor said, the thrower can be charged with manslaughter (voluntary or involuntary) which carries a sentence of 15–20 years in prison.

If it is not a criminal charge, then the situation is turned over to Housing Services, O'Connor said.

According to Director of Housing Michael Gilbert, the 1996–7 Undergraduate Rights & Responsibilities and Residence Hall Manual clearly spell out the campus policies with regards to such behavior.

The Rights & Responsibilities states: "Endangering the safety of persons (self or others) or property, or any action that might lead to loss of life or serious physical harm to others, including but not limited to throwing or dropping objects

Crayon figure sparks Smith rally

Simmons speaks out against racism to over 550 in Northampton

JAMES STANLEY / COLLEGIAN

Over 550 Smith College students and other protesters held an anti–racism rally last night in Northampton as a reaction to a racist drawing of a person hanging by a noose.

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON - A crayoned figure of a person hanging by a noose from a tree branch was depicted on a dry erase board to welcome home an African–American first year student at Smith College Sept. 5, after she returned from a conference that kept her overnight.

Smith College responded to this act of racism by holding a protest rally last night in support of this student, who prefers to remain anonymous. It also was meant to send a message that "racism will not be tolerated at Smith College," said Amanda Gillman, president of Smith Student Government.

More than 550 people turned out to march from the Unity House, which holds seven minority based organizations, to the Quad, a central area in the residential section of campus.

Smith College students, as well as students from several other surrounding colleges, Northampton residents, Smith faculty and people of a wide range of ages and races held lit candles and chanted "One...Two...Three...Four... racism no more. Five...Six... Seven... Eight... we will not tolerate."

President of Smith College, Ruth Simmons was among the speakers at the protest. While speaking of the terror she experienced as a black child growing up in the South, her voice broke describing her fear "of the chance that someone would call me a name I didn't want to hear, or attack me, or tell me that I shouldn't be.

"When I heard of the drawing, all of those moments came back to me vividly," said Simmons, who had marched with the crowd from the starting point. "If anyone thinks that this is just a silly drawing and that it shouldn't get this much attention, you are so wrong."

According to Lisa Hori–Garcia, who is the head resident at the Tylor House dormitory, this year's show of racism is not an isolated act at Smith College, but during her five years at Smith it has been an annual occurrence that "everyone tries to brush under the carpet."

According to Hori–Garcia, Simmons created the Campus Climate Working group (CCW), in response to a similar incident that occurred last spring, in an attempt to "really make Smith a safe place where diversity can be accepted."

Gillman said that CCW is an organization where students can address diversity issues.

The second message predominantly sent by the speakers was of hope that those who attended the rally would not forget about the issue tomorrow, but to continue in the struggle against racism.

The crowd was encouraged to continue to involve themselves in the number of multi–cultural events and presentations offered at Smith to increase awareness and education.

The rally closed with Michelle Gutierrez, president of Nosotras, a Latino organization, reading a poem from the Holocaust period "to show that racism, sexism, and all the other ism's out there are everyone's problem."

Heavy rains cause MASSive flooding

BOSTON (AP) — Hundreds of people were evacuated from homes, and others were plucked from stalled cars as wind and rain swept through Massachusetts, knocking out power and adding to an already rainy October.

Thousands of residents lost electric power for at least part of the weekend and streets became rivers; in addition, one dam let go, and another was in danger this morning.

Gov. William F. Weld declared a state of emergency in the Eastern Massachusetts counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Middlesex, Essex and Plymouth this morning, easing the way for the state to seek federal aid and to pay overtime to public workers.

Boston posted a new record for rainfall in a 24–hour period in October, with 6.11 inches falling Sunday, National Weather Service meteorologist Mike Dion said this morning.

A total of 7.66 inches had fallen on the city during the storm as of 10 a.m. today.

Storm totals reported around the state as of 6 a.m. yesterday were: Newburyport, 10.57 inches; North Andover, 9.75 inches; Lexington, 9.84; Worcester, 3.54; Acushnet, 4.07; Plymouth, 4.69; Eastham, 3.71.

And in Taunton, where the weather service is based, "It's about 5.95 inches here in the office," Dion said. Typical fall storms bring 1 to 2 inches, and the average rainfall for Massachusetts in October is 3.3 inches.

Most of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority's Green Line trains were halted by the storm because the entire subway tunnel at Kenmore Station was flooded.

At the flood's peak Sunday night, the water was 14 feet deep and lapping against the token–seller's booth upstairs, but by yesterday morning it had subsided to 10 feet, said MBTA spokesman Brian Pedro.

"Kenmore Square is the mother of all bad stops right now," Pedro said. "We've had people working here 20 to 30 years and Kenmore has never been this high."

The "E" branch of the Green Line, which does not run through Kenmore, also was flooded at Copley Place. Commuter rail service to Fitchburg and Lowell also was disrupted.

Holyoke Police blamed the storm for a two–car crash that killed a Holyoke woman early Sunday. Police Capt. Russell Paquette said 40–year–old Sharon Judge of Holyoke was a passenger in one of the cars involved in the crash on Route 202 near Ashley Reservoir.

The National Weather Service today issued flood warnings for Boston, Cambridge and North and South Shore points, and for the Framingham, Lowell, Lawrence and Haverhill areas, and Brockton, Foxboro and Norwood.

Forecasters said the rain would continue today, at least occasionally, and that it would be briefly heavy in places. Tomorrow is expected to be fair, but there was a chance of more showers Thursday.

Officials were trying to reinforce a dam at the south end of Horn Pond in Woburn, fearing that it might let go and send water cascading into Woburn and Winchester.

"Right now it's still holding up, but minute by minute the water's getting higher," Winchester Fire Capt. Barry McNutt said at 11 a.m. yesterday. "It probably will be pushing for another eight hours."

Dole takes hard stance on "soft" contributions

By Connie Cass
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The big-money corporate and union donations that Republican presidential challenger Bob Dole says should be abolished are pouring into both political parties in record amounts this year.

They call it "soft money," but it's hard cash to the Democrats and Republicans. The parties rely on these donations, which are exempt from the legal contribution limits, to pay for TV advertising and other efforts.

Soft money accounted for $87 million of the $239 million brought in by the Republican National Committee since January 1995, a financial report filed Sunday shows. The receipts include any loans or transfers from other party committees but are primarily from contributions.

In September, as in every month, the GOP received soft money from businesses: $215,000 from Seagram & Sons distillery, $100,000 from Independent Life & Accident Insurance Co., and so on. The Democratic National Committee relied on soft money for $84 million of its $177 million in receipts over the same 21–month period, according to its report to the Federal Election Commission. In addition to corporate dollars, the Democrats get lots of labor union money, such as a $400,000 check from the Communications Workers of America in July.

Even before their October fund raising is counted, both parties have doubled the record amount of soft money they raised for the 1994 elections. The Republican National Committee took in $46 million in soft money that year; the Democrats, $41 million. Dole has sought to make campaign financing reform a prominent issue in the presidential campaign, capitalizing on reports that people connected to an Indonesian conglomerate donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Democratic Party. Foreign companies are banned from contributing directly to U.S. campaigns.

On Sunday, Dole proposed several measures to strengthen the reform laws written after Watergate, including eliminating soft money.

"I believe we can restore faith in the system by taking the special interests out of it," he said.

President Clinton also has called for campaign finance reform, and his aides on Sunday accused Dole of coming late to the issue after opposing reform in the past.

Despite years of talk about restricting or ending soft money, it keeps rolling in and the parties keep finding new ways to use it. Corporations and unions are prohibited from making campaign contributions to candidates, and individuals are limited to giving each party $20,000 per year. But those rules do not apply to soft money.

Soft money donations must be used for party-building activities, such as get-out-the-vote drives, and cannot legally be spent to directly influence a federal election.

But the distinction has blurred. This year both parties have spent millions of "soft" dollars on so-called issues advertising. Each party contends its ads are within the law, even when they appear to endorse candidates or criticize their opponents. The ads have become commonplace in the presidential race.

"In the past, the parties did issues advertising in the couple of months leading up to the election," said Anthony Corrado, an assistant professor at Colby College in Maine who studies campaign finance.

"This year we've seen both parties engaging in these types of partisan ads much earlier than ever before," he said. "In order to finance these campaigns, they need to raise more money." In overall receipts, the Republican National Committee reported $92.5 million over the last three months, out-raising the Democrats by 2-1. Since January 1995, the national party has raked in $239 million.

The Democratic National Committee took in $46.5 million last quarter and reported receipts that total $177 million since the start of last year.

Going into the final month of campaigning, the GOP committee reported $3.8 million in cash on hand and no debt. Its Democratic counterpart, in contrast, had only about $100,000 left when its $4.7 million in debt was balanced against $4.8 million in cash. But millions more is rolling into both parties this month to finance the final rush of spending before the Nov. 5 elections.

Ortega won't concede defeat

Eloy O. Aguilar
Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Conservative former Managua Mayor Arnoldo Aleman claimed victory today in Nicaragua's presidential election, but former Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega refused to concede defeat.

Sunday's vote marked the first time in Nicaragua that one democratically elected civilian government has transferred power to another.

In official results from 36 percent of the precincts, Aleman led with 48 percent of the vote versus 39 percent for Ortega. Another 21 candidates shared the remaining votes.

Aleman's party predicted the trend would hold, meaning he would get the 45 percent margin needed to avoid a runoff.

"The people of Nicaragua are the winners of this election," Aleman told jubilant supporters early this morning. "We are going to call on all political forces of the country to join us in a national government."

"The people of Nicaragua want peace, progress and jobs," he added. "Nicaragua needs all of us. Let us leave the past behind us, let not the future frighten us."

But with results coming in slowly today, Ortega cautioned that "the last word still has not been spoken."

"The Liberal Alliance has gone out in a very rash manner [when there are still not enough results to claim victory]," Ortega told reporters this morning.

He said a Sandinista count of returns from around the country showed his party leading by 1 percent, and he urged Sandinista pollworkers to stay at their posts to ward off vote fraud. Confident of victory, hundreds of red-shirted Aleman followers gathered overnight at his Liberal Alliance's headquarters to celebrate with music and dancing while they waited for results. By contrast, Ortega's campaign headquarters was nearly deserted. Outgoing President Violeta Chamorro called it a "beautiful process" and thanked Nicaraguans for their patience in the poorly organized elections, in which voters began lining up at 2 a.m. Sunday and stood in those lines for hours.

"This is what I want, that we may continue to build what we started in 1990," she said, referring to the Central American country's first democratic presidential election. "People wanted to vote."

Chamorro's election six years ago ended the Marxist Sandinista's 10-year regime, which in turn had ended the rightist Somoza dictatorship that fell in 1979.

Aleman campaigned on warnings that an Ortega victory would mean a return to the Sandinista years of 1980s, marked by shortages, ration cards and a heavy-handed, military-led central government. The government was prone to press censorship and confrontation with the private sector, the Roman Catholic Church and the United States. The United States, which waged an undeclared war against Ortega and the Sandinistas in the 1980s, has said it was neutral but has suggested it was nervous about a possible Ortega win.

Ortega was jailed and tortured by Somoza for seven years in the 1970s and Aleman was jailed and had his property confiscated by the Sandinistas in the 1980s.

Ortega had publicly admitted that he and his party made mistakes, but pledged that those mistakes would not be repeated and advocated a free market economy and better relations with the United States.

The enthusiasm and determination of Nicaraguan voters who patiently waited for hours were matched only by bureaucratic inefficiency and poor organization.

Delays in the delivery of ballots, incomplete ballot packages, officials who showed up late and power blackouts forced the electoral council to extend the voting two hours until 8 p.m. In at least three precincts, however, voters were still standing in line at 11 p.m.

Nearly 2,500 foreign observers monitored the elections. One of them was former President Carter, who said after visiting the polling places that his initial impression "is that the election is being properly held, open, honest and fair."

The new president takes office Jan. 10 for a five-year term. Chamorro was ineligible for re-election.

Clinton confidently campaigns

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

TEANECK, N.J. — President Clinton detoured in the home stretch of the White House race Sunday to raise millions of dollars for Democrats in the face of growing Republican criticism about accepting foreign political contributions.

"Both sides do it," White House chief of staff Leon Panetta said about taking foreign donations. "It's not to say it's right."

Clinton, confident of his own victory on Nov. 5, urged supporters not to be overly complacent. "I'd like to celebrate, scream and shout but it's not over yet. It's a long way from over."

He said he was troubled by the tone of the campaign. "One of the things that concerns me about campaigns when they become too negative is that a lot of people can then just get kind of turned off and say, 'Well, maybe this doesn't have anything to do with me.'"

Ahead in the polls, Clinton devoted the day to political fund-raisers in New Jersey and New York to boost Democrats' chances of recapturing Congress.

Sunday's events were the second in a series of three fund-raisers expected to produce as much as $15 million for the Democratic National Committee and the party's House and Senate political arms.

Clinton was heckled at a fund-raiser for Rep. Robert Torricelli by a woman who shouted criticism of the U.S. blockade against Cuba and asserted that economic sanctions against Iraq had killed a million children.

"That's one of the biggest lies I have ever heard," Clinton said angrily. "Saddam Hussein is oppressing his people; we're not. Secondly, Fidel Castro had Americans murdered illegally and that was wrong too and I'm proud that we have a blockade against people who kill innocent Americans."

He was apparently referring to the February shootdown of planes piloted by Cuban-Americans over the Florida Straits.

The woman, carrying a sign for the Workers World Party, and a colleague were escorted out by security after the president said it was a private event and encouraged the sponsors to maintain order. Opening a five-day trip through industrial states and the deep South, Clinton stopped first at a rousing Sunday morning service at the New Hope Baptist Church in Newark.

Welcomed with a standing ovation, Clinton swayed to the beat of the singing and then stood in the pulpit to deliver a mini version of his stump speech.

"I know a lot of politicians show up when it's election time," Rev. Vincent J. Thomas said in a lively sermon emphasizing self-reliance and trust in God. "Don't fool yourself. People in the African-American community are not waiting for them to fix everythin…We're not waiting for some great oracles." Thomas said he preferred to call the White House "America's House," given the color of the major presidential candidates this year. "That got my attention," Clinton said later. "But I'm proud to make it your house, too." His comment drew loud applause. Back in Washington, Panetta answered criticism from Republican challenger Bob Dole about hundreds of thousands of dollars in foreign contributions to Clinton and the Democrats from a network of people and companies associated with Indonesia's powerful Riady banking family.

On NBC's "Meet the Press," Panetta accused Dole of hypocrisy, saying Republicans, too, have accepted money from foreign corporations. "Both sides do it. It's not to say it's right." Panetta said it was legal "under the rules" to take money from American subsidiaries of foreign corporations. He said only about 1 percent of the contributions are called into question.

"You can't do a background check on everybody who gives you a contribution," Panetta said. "You can't go after everybody's background in terms of determining, when you're raising millions of dollars, what's involved here. The answer to this ultimately is campaign finance reform. Bob Dole has filibustered campaign finance reform six times."

In New Jersey, Toricelli is in a neck-and-neck battle with Republican Rep. Richard Zimmer for the New Jersey Senate seat of Democrat Bill Bradley, who is retiring.

Dole calls for campaign finance overhaul

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

NASHUA, N.H. — Keeping his focus on politics and funding, Bob Dole on Sunday proposed an overhaul of campaign financing to keep big money and foreign interests out and "to preserve the American people's confidence in the system."

"We simply cannot allow the political influence of any American to be outweighed by foreign money," said Dole, seeking to capitalize on recent revelations that people with ties to an Indonesian conglomerate have raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Democratic Party.

"In an American election, the voice of a single citizen must speak louder than the entire world," he told an audience of a few hundred who braved a driving rainstorm to hear his speech at Daniel Webster College.

Under current federal rules, foreigners who are legal U.S. residents can donate money to American candidates, and in fact Dole has received such donations himself. U.S. subsidiaries of foreign companies also can make contributions, if the money was earned in the United States.

Dole said only American citizens who are eligible to vote should be allowed to donate money. He also called for wider reforms, noting that changes made after the Watergate scandal have not done enough.

"If we're going to preserve the American people's confidence in the system, we need to return campaign finance to the front burner," Dole said.

Dole said a bipartisan commission should tackle overall campaign finance reform that Congress has never been able to do it and failed to do again this year. He laid out several other "core principles," including:

• Abolishing so-called "soft money," contributions from corporations, labor unions and other entities to help political parties finance ad campaigns and other efforts.

• Reducing the influence of special-interest political action committees, although he did not say how. Dole has been among politicians in both parties who have long benefited from PAC largesse.

• Ending the practice by some labor unions of using members' dues to pay for independent efforts aimed at influencing elections. Republicans have been hit hard this year by a $35 million AFL-CIO campaign aimed at unseating freshman Republicans.

President Clinton's re-election team said Dole was being hypocritical in calling for campaign finance reform when he had opposed many such measures in his 35-year career in Congress, including last year when a major effort failed to limit Senate and House campaign spending and abolish PACs.

"We agree that campaign finance reform is long overdue and should be dealt with in a bipartisan fashion. But it's a little late and disingenuous for Bob Dole to promote campaign finance reform," Clinton campaign spokesman Joe Lockhart said. " It's too bad that Senator Bob Dole's record doesn't match candidate Dole's rhetoric."

Dole's visit to New Hampshire — a state he has never won in three GOP primary tries — demonstrated his difficulty in defeating Clinton with 15 days remaining until Election Day.

Normally, a bedrock Republican state, Clinton holds double-digit lead in most polls here. Still, Dole put on a brave face.

"I'm in New Hampshire because I want to win this state. I've placed second a couple of times. I want to place first for a change," he said.

Don't forget to read

Daniel E. Levenson

In a society which is becoming increasingly dependent on computers and electronic media, the line between what is and what is not good journalism is becoming increasingly blurred.

Not that the American public is unable to discern trash from truth.

On the contrary, with the constant flood of information washing across the continent from coast to coast you would have to be living in a cave inside the Earth's core not to know what's going on.

With more people tuning in to television shows like "Hard Copy" and "Inside Edition" (the electronic equivalent of Mad magazine), it would seem to me that instead of educating the public, they are making the American public more stupid as a whole.

With printed news, information is clearly distinguishable and separated from advertising. On television the separation is not as evident. 30 second spots for everything from dog food to the Republican party make equal appearances during breaks on everything from "Larry King Live" to "A Current Affair."

However, I find it interesting that you probably won't see an ad for a strip joint in Newsweek or a "Bob Dole for president" ad in the National Enquirer.

The power of the written word lies in its ability to not only state positions, but to give them a lasting quality. For some reason it is easier to recant verbal offenses than those we put to paper.

Perhaps it is because when we hear a person speak, mistakes can be explained away as a slip of the tongue or lack of thought, but readers are usually less forgiving when it comes down to written ideas.

We always seem to hold writers responsible for what they write significantly more so than we do for those who speak their thoughts because there is the assumption that those who pick up a pen automatically are going to think in-depth about every word they put down.

Writing lasts. If the Constitution of the United States had been an hour-long televised speech, no one would have remembered it.

In the minds of many, the act of committing ink to paper can instantly give credence to ideas ranging from normal to nuts.

In a recent Time magazine article about the proliferation of news and media forms and formats, Richard Zoglin talks about a narrowing of news focus. The individual is informed of exactly what they need to know by selecting a way to get information. But this new trend is not without a cost. Much of it seems to be coming at the expense of depriving the community of what Zoglin calls a "common pool of information."

But is there really such thing as a "common pool of information?"

In some ways, I guess, every media form is.

The staff of a newspaper or a televised news gathers together what they deem to be of interest and importance, and then places it out in a mental feeding trough for the public to gorge themselves on.

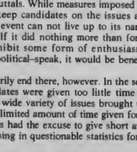
But the word "common" would seem to denote applicability to a wide range of interests, with a connecting thread.

And this is where televised/on-line information and printed news diverge on the paths of journalistic integrity and usefulness.

Newspapers, seeking to provide a forum for the community to discuss ideas and issues, do so in a very concrete way provide that necessary reservoir of facts, opinion and cross-word puzzles.

Shows like "Hard Copy" on the other hand clearly do not even provide enough cogent news to fill a glass with drinkable material.

On the other hand, programs like "20/20" and "60 Minutes" fall into their own category. They tend to editorialize more than other news shows, but are often willing to delve into the more human side of issues.



They discuss important issues and are often willing to go after people to get behind things and figure them out. In doing so, they provide us with different insights.

Hearing the opinions of informed reporters is interesting, but ultimately, what does the public an even greater and more important service is reporters providing the public with objective news allowing people to make up their own minds.

With so much on the minds and in the hearts of the world's citizens today, there is a responsibility to provide people with a source of accurate information from which they can draw their own conclusions and form their own opinions.

From smoke screens to dialogue

Michael Elliott

Today, State Senator Jane Swift will come to campus and participate in a "round table" discussion with students, hoping to court our votes in her race for Congress against incumbent Rep. John Olver. While the event may prove insightful to those who have a expressed interest in this election, the fact that a actual debate with Olver could not be arranged is unfortunate.

In this election season, however, it is not surprising. The debate, once an essential function of the electoral process, has been stripped of substance and political relevance, becoming more like a dual press conference, as opposed to a forum where two sides of a issue are evaluated. Even Sen. John Kerry and Gov. William F. Weld, who have commendably put themselves through an extensive series of debates, failed in that many of their encounters side-stepped important issues and degraded into what sounded like personal attacks.

The worst example, of course, is the Presidential debates. Republican nominee Bob Dole and President Bill Clinton talked and talked and talked and in the end, said really nothing at all.

The problem exists primarily in debate format. It would only be appropriate for the candidates to actually engage and question each other, rather than tossing out snipes disguised as rebuttals. While measures imposed by debate organizers to keep candidates on the issues are certainly required, the event can not live up to its name without an argument. If it did nothing more than force the candidates to exhibit some form of enthusiasm, breaking the mask of political-speak, it would be beneficial.

It would not necessarily end there, however. In the second debate, the candidates were given too little time to adequately address the wide variety of issues brought up by the audience. In the limited amount of time given for a response, the candidates had the excuse to give short and unspecific answers, tossing in questionable statistics for a polished sound.

For an undecided voter, the two debates hardly accomplished the task of defining and contrasting the positions of the candidates.

The first change, therefore, would be to not only hold more debates, but to specify a particular issue of discussion for each one.

For example, the candidates could have traveled to Oregon to discuss natural resource and environmental issues; a b-line to Massachusetts, to debate higher education before heading back to Michigan to talk about the middle class; New York City to discuss foreign policy at the United Nations; Los Angeles to address issues of multiculturalism and race; Hartford for Health Care; Kansas for agriculture; Washington for taxes; Silicon Valley for technology; Florida for Medicare and social security; Chicago for low income entitlement — it could go on, and should.

These forums would include activists and community members which have a very direct, personal stake in the topic of debate. The candidates, obviously prepared by their staff, could concentrate their arguments on one issue. In an hour and a half, they would be forced to cite specific accomplishments and engage their opponent in a manner more articulate than sound bite upper-cuts.

The next question is, of course, would anyone care or even watch? The likelihood that the major networks would give up over a half dozen prime time slots to hear Clinton and Dole rant on required changes to the Farm Bill or Superfund is very unlikely.

Compared to the alternative, however, a more extensive debate series seems to be the only productive option. All one has to do was watch or read the post-debate analysis after the last match-up. The emphasis on establishing a "victor" stems from the game-like atmosphere and tactics employed by the candidates — short, well-packaged and vague.

Just as we will miss out today from an informative Swift- Olver debate, the country missed out with Dole and Clinton. Olver will certainly follow suit after the Swift forum today and come to the University of Massachusetts himself. The potential for a crucial debate on the federal role in higher education was however, disappointingly missed — a trend which will continue on any issue at the national level, until those seeking office re-think the role of debates.

One foot in the grave

Mark McGrath

While reading a recent magazine article, I came across the fact that two-thirds of premature deaths (before age 65) are the result of factors that can be controlled, things like drinking, smoking, not eating correctly and not exercising enough. I had already known that taking part in these activities was not good for the body, but this factoid struck me on the head.

I will not attempt to preach to you about how healthy you should be, and how you should get five servings of fruits and veggies per day or how you should go jogging instead of watching the game at night. Certainly, I am not in a position to be preaching. I am one of the millions of people who will probably die before reaching 65, unless I am somehow able to turn myself around.

Death is not something to be taken lightly. It is a very serious matter which happens to be looking many of us directly in the eye, and I have figured out that the next few years are going to be crucial in determining whether or not I'll ever see my children graduate from college or if I'll ever hear the word "Grampy" spoken in my direction.

These points established, I wonder what makes it so difficult to change. I don't feel like I have addictions, but it has become plainly obvious that I don't have control in my life, especially when matters of health are concerned. The fact that I can't resist that liquid cheese they put on nachos or sour cream on anything is looking more like a death sentence every day. Somewhere in this mess, there is a problem.

The problem is more like a paradox. I call it the great health and food paradox: good tasting food equals bad health, bad tasting food equals good health. Why is it like this? I don't know. It just is.

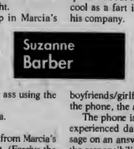
The theme has found a larger place in society. It governs many aspects of our lives. If it makes you feel good, it's more than likely something that could end up killing you. If it makes you happy, you lose at least a day (usually more) of your life for doing it.

What's with this link between fun and death, you ask? There are many hypotheses. Perhaps there is no such thing as fun, that what we know as fun could really be a bunch of rebel brain cells tingling every time we do something that puts ourselves in jeopardy. Maybe we subconsciously think that we are not worthy of life and allow ourselves to be governed by the senseless tingling.

Maybe we have been conditioned to see as fun the things that are separate from hard work and the desire to move on. It could be evolutionary. Survival of the fittest. Those who don't do anything to push the species on are systematically wiped out by nature. Whatever the case, it's time we begin looking for a solution.

But how are we to make Brussels sprouts and marathons look like fun? Or is that a possibility? How can we deglamorize what is currently thought of as fun? Or do we want to? The questions greatly outnumber the answers. Society is constantly pounding us with messages that indicate what is fun and what is not. Joe Camel thinks that smoking is fun... and so cool (hack-hack). Those ridiculous Budweiser frogs could drink till they croak. Ronald MacDonald (a fun guy) may not be real, but if he was, he'd need a quadruple bypass after consuming as many Big Macs as he has had over the years.

Every company that advertises anything wants you to believe that their respective product will increase the fun quotient of your life. Have we started believing them? Will we not realize that they are more put for their own good than ours? And that they're not going to help us become healthier until that's what we're willing to pay for? They'd just as soon kill us if it will give them a wide profit margin.



The problem with what we see as fun is that it is immediate, a type of instant gratification. The bulk of society (myself included) mistakenly assumes that fun must be had right now, that there may not be any more later. That there is no fun in waiting. While there is a chance that a bolt of lightning could strike us down at any moment, to live assuming death is right around the corner may not be the best long-term philosophy. It could be very taxing on your future.

To become a healthy society, I think it is important that we see fun as a part of the future, not of the present, and let ourselves be governed by what will get us there, which brings me back to the original statement. Two-thirds of premature deaths come as a result of actions that can conceivably be avoided, but aren't.

While the fellas over at Pizza Hut have managed to convince me in the past that a triple decker pizza is the true road to happiness, to compare a slice with the possibility of holding my own grandchild (or even great-grandchild) has momentarily convinced me that I'm better off with a salad.

The dating shame

Suzanne Barber

Something just suddenly came up," Marcia said to her strapping young suitor.

The poor boy's teenage dreams were shattered. He wouldn't get to take the grooviest girl in his high school to the dance in Saturday. "I wonder what came up," he thought as he walked away with his shoulders slumped beneath his butterfly-collar. He would never know what it would be like to run his fingers through her flaxen blonde hair that she brushed a 100 strokes every night.

Little did he know, he was the chump in Marcia's ploy to go to the dance with a cooler guy.

On the advice of her brother, Greg, who was a favorite with the ladies, Marcia breezed out of her commitment.

As you probably remember, Miss Brady got a little taste of her own medicine later that week when the cooler guy dumped her ass using the same cheesy line.

What goes around comes around, Marcia.

Dating games never pay off.

Unfortunately, none of us learned a lesson from Marcia's game gone wrong. Dating has become a sport. (Forgive the extended sport metaphor, but my uniform is way too clean— I feel like Rudy. Someday, though when JFK Jr. comes to his senses, I'll score the winning touchdown and thousands will chant "Ru-dy Ru-dy." I'll be a hero.)

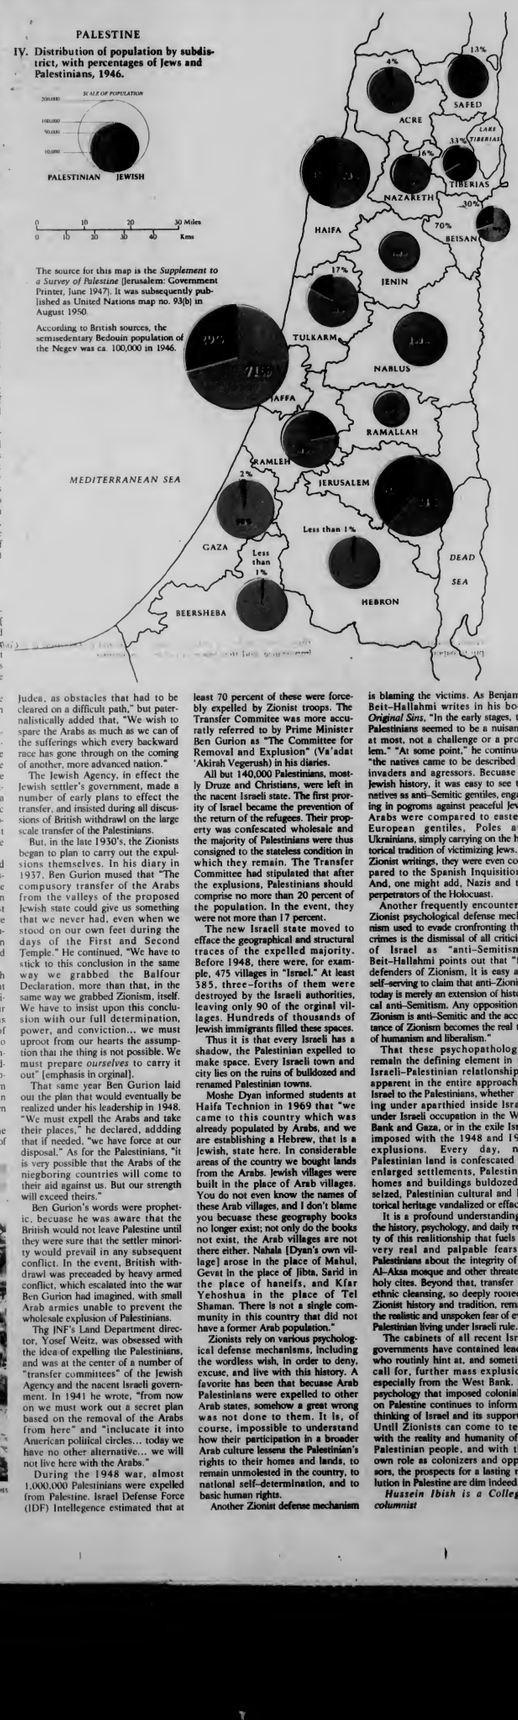
Some self-proclaimed dating experts could be considered the coaches in this sport. Last week, the "Oprah Winfrey Show" featured an author of a book designed to teach women how to become "marryable." It advises ridiculous tactics like, "Never call him, only let him call you" and "Never accept a Saturday date after Wednesday." (Maybe that's why Marcia can't go to the dance.)

Looks like a certain guest of the "Oprah Winfrey Show" has been spending Saturday nights lone, feels left out and wants everyone else in the country to join her. Misery loves company. The author of this smut also advises things like laughing at your date's jokes. Here's a flaw in that plan: some guys aren't funny.

I once dated a guy who thought silences were awkward, so he filled them. Whenever we traveled the long and winding road to the point of his epic anecdote, I would realize that it was not worth the peregrination. (That last fifty cent word, meaning "long journey " is dedicated to a "Jeopardy" fan — you know who you are). All of his stories ended with him writhing in hysterical laughter while I watched in horror. Eventually, he'd calm down and say, "you had to be there." Somehow, I think I'm glad I wasn't there. I had no qualms about not laughing at his jokes. He was about as cool as a fart in church. Only a masochist would enjoy his company.

Dating games have become rampant. I have watched as many of my male friends are trailed by evil temptresses who suck the life right out of them. While my friends who have found "romantic bliss" are enslaved by their boyfriends/girlfriends, my single friends are enslaved by the phone, the answering machines and e-mail.

The phone is the most destructive dating weapon. The experienced dater's cardinal rule is: never leave a message on an answering machine. For one thing, it transfers the responsibility of the return phone call, thereby revoking the right to try calling back later. More importantly, there's too much opportunity for sounding like a moron on the machine: "Hi, I guess you're not around, I was just calling umm you to... umm well, so, yeah call me later if you feel like it or I'll call you later or you can all me— whatever— I'm easy. I mean— I am not easy. I mean, I can go either way— no— wait that's not what I meant— I meant : either way doesn't matter- you call me or I'll call you. So, I guess I'll talk to you later."



There's no turning back after that. It's there on tape to be played for all the roommates' amusement over and over. Then they start playing it at parties, you hear it on a remix, a dance version, what have you. It's a nightmare.

Dating seems to be like chess, except the pawns wear CK One. All the strategies of carefully concocted phone calls and party-appearances, have become ridiculous. The whole act of "playing it cool" and not seeming overly interested is just out of control. Here's a novel strategy: if you ask for what you want, you just might get it. Hey— you might win.

Fantasy and reality in Zionist colonial thought

The source for this map is the Supplement to a Survey of Palestine [Jerusalem: Government Printer, June 1947]. It was subsequently published as United Nations map no. 93(b) in August 1950.

According to British sources, the semisedentary Bedouin population of the Negev was ca. 100,000 in 1946.

"There was no such thing as Palestinians... It was not as though there was a Palestinian people in Palestine and considering itself as a Palestinian people, and we came and threw them out and took their country away from them. They did not exist."

— Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir, 1969

Hussein Ibish

Zionism, the project to establish a colonial settler state for European Jews in Palestine, has, from its outset almost 100 years ago, been confronted by an element of reality for which it could not account: the Palestinian people.

Zionists have taken refuge in neurotic forms of denial with regard to the very existance of their Palestinian victims, and attempted to propagate this denial to a vast international audience over many decades. The slogan that, for so many years, represented the Zionist dream to millions of Jews and Gentiles in the Western nations, "A land without a people for a people without a land," perfectly expresses the spirit of this psychic and rhetorical will to genocide, given that Palestine was well populated with Palestinians.

Clinging to one form or another of this racist psychopathogy, Zionists and Israel have sought to impose their neurotic blindness on the real world by making the Palestinians, as a people, disappear. The mass expulsion of most of the Palestinians in 1948, followed by the systematic destruction, resettling and renaming of their villages, towns and cities literalized and actualized the Zionist denial of their existence. The Palestians were literally made to "disappear."

The Wordless Wish

In describing the Zionist attitude towards the Palestinians, Erskin Childers recalled Patrick Keatly's account of white settlers in southern Africa to the effect that "one cannot help feeling... that in their heart of hearts, the white Rhodesians bear a wordless wish... that the Africans would disappear."

Childers was, of cobrse, quite right in identifying "the psychopathology of the wordless wish" with the Zionist movement. From its outset, it proceeded as if the Palestinians, did not, in fact, exist. As Amos Elon explains, "for decades, the Zionist leaders moved in a strange twilight zone seeing the Arabs and the same time not seeing them."

Some Zionists even recount being surprised to learn of the existance of the large Arab population. Max Nordau, chief aide to Theodor Herzl, the founder of the Zionist Movement, confronted his mentor in 1897. He exclaimed, "but there are Arabs in Palestine. I did not know that." A few years later, Zionist leader and Israel's first president, Chiam Weitzman, reported that he had been informed by the British Foriegn Office that "there are a few hundred thousand Negroes [in Palestine], but that is a matter of no significance."

For the most part, however, there is little doubt that the Zionists really were not ignorant of the existance of the Palestinians. Rather, they engaged in psychic and rhetorical acts of denial. Historian Nur Masalha explains that, "They did not mean that there were no people in Palestine, but that there were no people worth considering within the framework of the notions of European supremacy that then held sway." The Palestinians were therefore presumed not to exist, ignored, disregarded, or dismissed.

One classic example of this attitude is in the text of the Balfour Declaration, the 1917 statement by the British government pledging British imperial support for a Zionist settler-state in Palestine. In passing, it referrs to the 93 percent majority Palestinian population of Palestine as "existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine." Clearly, the act of dismissing what amounted in fact to the entire population of the country as "existing non-Jewish communities," was an attempt to obscure, ignore and deny the actual demographics of the country and the consequent grotesque immorality of the Declaration's commitments.

Two years later, in 1919, Lord Balfour, author of the Declaration which was drafted in collaboration with the Zionists, explained the British thinking thus: "Zionism, be it right or wrong, good or bad, is rooted in age-long traditions, in present needs, in future hopes, of far profounder import than the desires and prejudices of the 700,000 Arabs who now inhabit that ancient land... The idea of planting a minority of outsiders upon an indigenous majority population, without consulting it, was not calculated to horrify men who had worked with Cecil Rhodes or promoted European settlement in Kenya." This great supporter of Zionism also confided to Weitzman that he shared certain "anti-Semitic postulates."

Zionist leaders often invoked classic European racist myths to describe how, even if Palestinians did exist, their rights did not count, especially when compared to European Jewish colonists. Chaim Weitzman explained in 1918 that, "the somewhat shifty and doubtful sympathies of the Arabs represent infinately less than the careful and considered policy of the Jewish people which sees in a British Palestine the realization of an age-old aspiration."

In 1920, Israel Zangwil explained that in his opinion Palestine was a "land without a people" because "there is no Arab people living in intimate fusion with the country... there is at best an Arab encampment." He added that Palestinians were "not entitled to the rules of democracy."

As the Zionist colonial project grew in Palestine, the psychological condition of the Zionist leaders scarcely improved. Israel's future first Prime Minister David Ben Gurion bizarrely declared that, "there is no conflict between Jewish and Palestinian nationalism because the Jewish nation is not in Palestine and the Palestinians are not a nation."

Avarham Stern, founder of the LEHI terrorist group and mentor of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir observed that "The Arabs are not a nation but a mob that grew in the wilderness of the eternal desert. They are nothing but murderers." "beasts of the desert, not a legitimate people."

As T.R. Feiwel observed in 1938, "examining the Jewish attitude to the Arabs during the years 1933-6, it would be difficult to find other than a frantic belief that the Arab did not exist. Already the official Zionist name for Palestine — Eretz Israel, land of Israel — emphaisized this attitude." He added "the history of Zionist policy towards the Arabs is that of this illusion, but an illusion fanatically upheld, [that] the Palestine Arabs do not exist..."

One of the more ingenious, bizarre and dastardly ways in which the myth of the non-existant Palestinians has been explained and propagated is the preposterous notion that as Jewish settlers immigrated to Palestine, there was a parralel giant migration of Arabs from other areas, and that therefore the Palestinians as such do not exist. This absurd theory was most prominently floated in Ernst Frankenstein's 1942 book, Justice for My People, but was seen for the fraud it was.

The theory was occasionally used by Israeli and Zionist propagandists in the West during the '50s and '60s, but was soon abandonned as dangingly ridiculous. But, in an extraodinary scandal which demonstrated that many Zionists remain deeply affected by the psychopathology of the wordless wish, the theory reemerged with a vengence in Joan Peters 1984 book, From Time Immemorial.

Peters had fabricated most of her evidence and plagerized whole erroneous and inane sections of Frankenstein's earlier work, to try to show that virtually all of the Palestinians had no historical connection to Palestine.

What is most interesting about the affair is the menagerie of illustrious writers and schollars whose Zionism prompted them to enthusiastically embrace and gush about Peters' insane book. These included Barbara Tuchman, Saul Bellow, Angier Biddle Duke, Philip Hauser, Elie Wiesel, Lucy Dawidowicz, Paul Cowan, Barbara Probst Solomon and Arther Goldberg.

These individuals, who certainly ought to have known better to say the least, could not have been more efusive in their praise. When the book was exposed as a fraud and hoax by Norman Finkelstein, and dismissed by the major historians of the Middle East, including Albert Hourani and Israel's leading "Arabist" Yehoshua Porath, few of these cheerleaders had the moral courage to admit their error.

The only plausable explanation for their enthusiasm about this terrible and repulsive book, which Edward Said has correctly described as "an extended act of ethnocide carried out by psuedo-scholarship," is the wordless wish. Peters' great achievement was to make the Palestinians, in this case in their historical and national identity, disappear. Such was the power of the wordless wish to distort the minds of many of the most eminent Zionist scholars in the United States.

The Wish Actualized

Were this will to genocide and ethnocidal denial merely a symptom of Zionist psychopathology, it would amount to little more than another form of mental illness. But in fact it represented the bedrock of the policies of one of the largest and most effective colonial projects in recent history.

While in fantasy and rhetoric, the Zionists willed the Palestinians away, in reality they drove them from the land.

As Nur Masalha points out, transfer "can be said to be the logical outgrowth of the ultimate goal of the Zionist movement, which was the establishment of a Jewish state through colonization and land aquisition — in other words, through a radical ethno-religious-demographic transformation of a country. the population of which had been almost entirely Arab at the start of the Zionist venture."

So, Zionism came to racism and ethnic cleansing as a matter of nessesity rather than orientation. But, the centrality of "transfer," the expulsion of the Palestinian people, to Zionist planning cannot be overstated. There was generally an element of economic coersion in the many plans, but in the event, the 1948 expulsion relied soely on brute force.

Virtually the entire Yishuv (Jewish settler community), of all different political stripes, believed in the priciple and nessesity of transfer. Nur Masalha points out that, "it was embraced by almost all shades of opinion, from the Revisionist right to the Labor left. Virtually every member of the Zionist pantheon of founding fathers and important leaders supported it and advocated it in one form or another, from Chaim Weitzman and Valdmir Jabotinsky to David Ben Gurion and Menahem Ussishkin."

Chaim Weitzman described the Palestinians as akin to "the rocks of Judea, as obstacles that had to be cleared on a difficult path," but paternalistically added that, "We wish to spare the Arabs as much as we can of the sufferings which every backward race has gone through on the coming of another, more advanced nation."

The Jewish Agency, in effect the Jewish settler's government, made a number of early plans to effect the transfer, and insisted during all discussions of British withdrawl on the large scale transfer of the Palestinians.

But, in the late 1930's, the Zionists began to plan to carry out the expulsions themselves. In his diary in 1937, Ben Gurion mused that "The compusory transfer of the Arabs from the valleys of the proposed Jewish state could give us something that we never had, even when we stood on our own feet during the days of the First and Second Temple." He continued, "We have to stick to this conclusion in the same way we grabbed the Balfour Declaration, more than that, in the same way we grabbed Zionism, itself. We have to insist upon this conclusion with our full determination, power, and conviction... we must uproot from our hearts the assumption that the thing is not possible. We must prepare ourselves to carry it out" [emphasis in orginal].

That same year Ben Gurion laid out the plan that would eventually be realized under his leadership in 1948. "We must expell the Arabs and take their places," he declared, addding that if needed, "we have force at our disposal." As for the Palestinians, "it is very possible that the Arabs of the neighboring countries will come to their aid against us. But our strength will exceed theirs."

Ben Gurion's words were prophetic, because he was aware that the British would not leave Palestine until they were sure that the settler minority would prevail in any subsequent conflict. In the event, British withdrawl was preceaded by heavy armed conflict, which escalated into the war Ben Gurion had imagined, with small Arab armies unable to prevent the wholesale explusion of Palestinians.

Thg JNF's Land Department director, Yosef Weitz, was obsessed with the idea of expelling the Palestinians, and was at the center of a number of "transfer committees" of the Jewish Agency and the nacent Israeli government. In 1941 he wrote, "from now on we must work out a secret plan based on the removal of the Arabs from here" and "inclucate it into American political circles... today we have no other alternative... we will not live here with the Arabs."

During the 1948 war, almost 1,000,000 Palestinians were expelled from Palestine. Israel Defense Force (IDF) Intellegence estimated that at least 70 percent of these were forcebly expelled by Zionist troops. The Transfer Commitee was more accurratly referred to by Prime Minister Ben Gurion as "The Committee for Removal and Explusion" (Va'adat 'Akirah Vegerush) in his diaries.

COURTESY INSTITUTE FOR PALESTINE STUDIES

A typical Palestinian refugee camp at Nahr al-Barid in northern Lebanon, winter 1948.

All but 140,000 Palestinians, mostly Druze and Christians, were left in the nacent Israeli state. The first priority of Israel became the prevention of the return of the refugees. Their property was confescated wholesale and the majority of Palestinians were thus consigned to the stateless condition in which they remain. The Transfer Committee had stipulated that after the explusions, Palestinians should comprise no more than 20 percent of the population. In the event, they were not more than 17 percent.

The new Israeli state moved to efface the geographical and structural traces of the expelled majority. Before 1948, there were, for example, 475 villages in "Israel." At least 385, three-forths of them were destroyed by the Israeli authorities, leaving only 90 of the orginal villages. Hundreds of thousands of Jewish immigrants filled these spaces.

Thus it is that every Israeli has a shadow, the Palestinian expelled to make space. Every Israeli town and city lies on the ruins of bulldozed and renamed Palestinian towns.

Moshe Dyan informed students at Haifa Technion in 1969 that "we came to this country which was already populated by Arabs, and we are establishing a Hebrew, that is a Jewish, state here. In considerable areas of the country we bought lands from the Arabs. Jewish villages were built in the place of Arab villages. You do not even know the names of these Arab villages, and I don't blame you because these geography books no longer exist; not only do the books not exist, the Arab villages are not there either. Nahala [Dyan's own village] arose in the place of Mahul, Gevat in the place of Jibta, Sarid in the place of haneifs, and Kfar Yehoshua in the place of Tel Shaman. There is not a single community in this country that did not have a former Arab population."

Zionists rely on various psychological defense mechanisms, including the wordless wish, in order to deny, excuse, and live with this history. A favorite has been that because Arab Palestinians were expelled to other Arab states, somehow a great wrong was not done to them. It is, of course, impossible to understand how their participation in a broader Arab culture lessens the Palestinian's rights to their homes and lands, to remain unmolested in the country, to national self-determination, and to basic human rights.

Another Zionist defense mechanism is blaming the victims. As Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi writes in his book Original Sins, "In the early stages, the Palestinians seemed to be a nuisance at most, not a challenge or a problem." "At some point," he continues, "the natives came to be described as invaders and agressors. Because of Jewish history, it was easy to see the natives as anti-Semitic gentiles, engaging in pogroms against peaceful Jews. Arabs were compared to eastern European gentiles, Poles and Ukrainians, simply carrying on the historical tradition of victimizing Jews. In Zionist writings, they were even compared to the Spanish Inquisition." And, one might add, Nazis and the perpetrators of the Holocaust.

Another frequently encountered Zionist psychological defense mechanism used to evade confronting their crimes is the dismissal of all criticism of Israel as "anti-Semitism." Beit-Hallahmi points out that "for defenders of Zionism, it is easy and self-serving to claim that anti-Zionism today is merely an extension of historical anti-Semitism. Any opposition to Zionism is anti-Semitic and the acceptance of Zionism becomes the real test of humanism and liberalism."

That these psychopathologies remain the defining element in the Israeli-Palestinian relationship is apparent in the entire approach of Israel to the Palestinians, whether living under apartihied inside Israel, under Israeli occupation in the West Bank and Gaza, or in the exile Israel imposed with the 1948 and 1967 explusions. Every day, new Palestinian land is confescated for enlarged settlements, Palestinian homes and buildings buldozed or seized, Palestinian cultural and historical heritage vandalized or effaced.

It is a profound understanding of the history, psychology, and daily reality of this realitionship that fuels the very real and palpable fears of Palestinians about the integrity of the Al-Aksa mosque and other threatened holy cites. Beyond that, transfer and ethnic cleansing, so deeply rooted in Zionist history and tradition, remains the realistic and unspoken fear of every Palestinian living under Israeli rule.

The cabinets of all recent Israeli governments have contained leaders who routinly hint at, and sometimes call for, further mass explusions, especially from the West Bank. The psychology that imposed colonialism on Palestine continues to inform the thinking of Israel and its supporters. Until Zionists can come to terms with the reality and humanity of the Palestinian people, and with their own role as colonizers and oppressors, the prospects for a lasting resolution in Palestine are dim indeed.

Stomp barges into FAC Music more than drums

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

If you haven't seen them, you've probably heard them. The international percussion sensation, Stomp, will make some noise at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight and tomorrow night. The sold-out show will begin at 8 p.m. both evenings.

Stomp was created by Steve McNichols and Luke Cresswell in Brighton, England. Five years ago, McNichols and Cresswell brought Stomp over the ocean to New York City where it made an immediate impression in the Big Apple. Now Stomp has grown to include an English cast, a New York cast and two touring casts.

The casts are made up of 11 members, but only eight members are on the stage. During the hour-and-half performance, the three swings come in and relieve other members.

According to cast member, Mignon Mason, the group uses anything that is ordinary to make a variety of sounds. Among some of the props she named were matchboxes, trash bins, zippo lighters, trash bags, fire extinguishers, pots and pans and sand.

"The pieces, with all eight people on stage, are powerful and rhythmically tight," Mason said.

But of course, a show can't just stand on sound alone.

"There's more to the show than making music through rhythms," Mason said. "There's a lot of comedy and interaction."

She added that the diversity among cast members helps a lot in creating an interesting show.

"Everyone brings their own flavor to the show. It kind of builds character development," Mason said.

And with the strange objects flying around the stage, there is the occasional injury like bashed knuckles and bruised knees.

"That happens all the time. Every now there is an injury, but that's par for the course. We go home and ice a lot," Mason said.

Stomp's strength is its innovativeness. Mason praised "the reality of the show. It's so down to earth. We're taking something that everyone can be in tune with. It should enlighten everyone to be more in tune with the rhythms of life."

And when it comes to describing the show, Mason said that Stomp is one of those shows you have to experience.

"Because there is no way actually to describe it. It's pure energy, it's pure emotion, it's pure fun. It's pure ecstasy in a way. It's a culmination of rhythm, sound and character. You go away hopefully tapping on something," she said.

Stomp is sold out for both nights. For more information, call the box office at 545-2511.

New Levinson film is excellent adaptation

Sleepers boasts major stars in an impressive ensemble piece of acting and filmmak-

By Jeremy Brothers

SLEEPERS
Directed by Barry Levinson with Jason Patric, Brad Pitt, Robert DeNiro, Dustin Hoffman, Kevin Bacon
Playing at Hampshire Six Theatres

We should probably know by now that every book that has ever been published will eventually be made into a movie. We should also know by now that not every one of these books should be made into a movie, and we have to navigate through the tidal waves of crap books to find something interesting to begin with, even if it's only to find something worthwhile to make a movie of.

Barry Levinson doesn't seem to have this problem with Sleepers, based upon the novel of the same name by Lorenzo Carcaterra. The story focuses around four teenagers who are sent to reform school, despite the pleas from their local parish priest (Robert DeNiro), and the violent crime that forces their reunion years later. As adults (played by Brad Pitt, Jason Patric, Billy Crudup and "E.R.'s" Ron Eldard) they face the violence not only of the present, but also that of their pasts.

While at the reform school, the young men are near- systematically tortured, beaten and raped by four of the men at the facility, lead by a particularly vicious guard (Kevin Bacon). Bacon plays the rapist with a snide superiority, his trademark whiny voice on chatty overload as he lectures on the importance of rules and discipline. He is able to force the audience to do more than hate him, his arrogance makes the impending revenge delicious.

Levinson deserves kudos for knowing when to pull us away from disturbing scenes. As the young men are led into a basement to be had by their tormentors, the camera's view is thankfully obscured by strewn junk throughout the room. As the torture continues, the camera starts panning back at an increasingly fast pace, forcing us to use our imaginations to picture what is going on.

The story of the four friends' adolescence and adulthood is narrated throughout by Jason Patric in a manner that seems rushed at times. At times, Patric's narration seems to skip over scenes which aren't crucial, but do seem to be missing from the flow of the story. Levinson seems insistent upon keeping so much of the original story, loading Hell's Kitchen with many seemingly authentic colorful characters. Minnie Driver, the long-suffering girlfriend to the group of friends, is convincing, not only as an American, but as a native to Hell's Kitchen.

As the local priest, Robert DeNiro reminds us that he doesn't need to be a screaming lunatic (as in the most recent The Fan,) to hold the title of Most Valuable Actor. Asked by his friends to lie in court, his face contorts— controlled physical acting that precious few would be able to make work. There is something entrancing about his face in this role— in a scene serving the Holy Communion to Patric, the camera grabs onto his eyes in a beautiful shot that has been overexposed by the theatre's trailers and television commercials.

Dustin Hoffman plays the alcoholic, pill-addict defense attorney that is in a scheme over his head. Hoffman's character is a delight, comic relief in a wasteland of serious horrors. As he stumbles about the courtroom, stringy hair and stubble enhancing his characterization, looking for the questions for the case, we realize not only how much can be made with a small role, but what a fine piece of ensemble acting has been put together here.

A riveting story and strong, restrained acting make Sleepers one of the most impressive films of the year. It seems it could only benefit from a longer running time. It's present running time of two hours and forty minutes doesn't drag by, in fact it seems to go by too quickly, it still seems to neglect minor characters.

A-

"Ellen" to come out and play?

By Jennifer Bowles
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES— Message to Ellen DeGeneres: Take a hint from "Star Trek" and boldly go where no man — or woman — has gone before.

Or as the sneaker company says: Just Do It.

The comedienne has been dangling a carrot in front of viewers for more than a month now, after it was leaked that her quirky character, Ellen Morgan, may "come out" as a lesbian.

The reports just happened to coincide with the season premiere of DeGeneres' Wednesday night sitcom "Ellen," which had been sagging in the ratings.

On one recent episode, she told her divorcing parents: "What if I said something shocking to you. Like my whole life has been a lie and I'm really... left handed."

Bursting from behind a closed door into the front hall of her new house, DeGeneres blurted out: "I was in the closet."

On the talk-show circuit, DeGeneres has toyed with the situation by saying her character will reveal herself as being... Lebanese, or that the show will add a new guy character named Les Bian.

Fans are starting to feel used. What started out as television's hottest topic has become its most ridiculously protracted gag.

Last Wednesday night, DeGeneres and the ABC show's cast, writers and producers were honored by the Museum of Television & Radio during its William S. Paley Television Festival in L.A.

And The Big Tease continued.

"I'm glad that everybody is paying attention for whatever reason," a beaming Degeneres told the sold-out audience.

"The most important thing is the quality of the show and that's all that matters."

During a question-and-answer session after the screening of two "Ellen" episodes, DeGeneres was asked whether her character would come out.

"Gee, I didn't think we'd be asked that," DeGeneres said coyly. "Now why would we tell you that? I think the answer will be in this season."

At one point, she asked the audience: "How long did you have to wait to find out who shot J.R.? People don't care about being shot so much, this person may be gay — it'll ruin everything in society!"

Later, when asked about the perils of outing her character, she said that whatever she decided to do, "it would be a risk and yes, it is a risk I would be willing to take."

So what's the holdup?

Could it be the family-friendly folks at the Walt Disney Co., which both produces "Ellen" and owns ABC? Might the studio be worried about boycotts against its advertisers by conservative religious groups increasingly critical of Disney product and practices?

True to form in these matters, the company had no comment about the "Ellen" closet question.

In cyberspace, meanwhile, most of the reaction has been favorable. "She'll ALWAYS be our wonderful Elly and I'll ALWAYS continue to watch and support her," wrote one U.S. fan. "Go Girl!"

From a viewer in Australia: "Applause to Microsoft, the first major sponsor of Ellen to come out and say they will stay with the show no matter what happens. Well done and take a bow, Microsoft."

Braves take 2–0 lead on Maddux gem

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The way Greg Maddux was pitching, one run would have been plenty.

The Atlanta Braves didn't need to go on another rampage, relying instead on Maddux's eight shutout innings to beat the New York Yankees 4-0 last night for a 2-0 lead in the World Series. Fred McGriff drove in three runs as the Braves won their fifth straight game in the postseason, a span in which they've outscored opponents 48-2. A night after a 12-1 romp, Maddux put the focus right back on Atlanta's awesome starters.

"He's something. He really is," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "He has his way with you. He was a master tonight.

"You don't see pitching like this every day. Unfortunately, we are seeing it every day."

The win moved the defending champions halfway toward another title, and sent the Series to Atlanta for the next three games — if all three are necessary. Of the 43 previous teams to take 2-0 leads, 33 have won it.

Because of an earlier rainout, there will be no travel day. Instead, Game 3 will be tonight, with 1995 World Series MVP Tom Glavine starting for the Braves against David Cone.

Maddux made it look easy, allowing six hits, permitting only two runners past first base and walking none. The lone time the Yankees put two runners on base in an inning, the four-time Cy Young winner induced Wade Boggs to bounce into a double play and got Bernie Williams to ground out to end the sixth.

"That was a typical Maddux game," Braves manager Bobby Cox said. "He was on top of his game. He was quick, sneaky, and the ball had a tremendous amount of life to it."

Mark Wohlers struck out the side in the ninth for the Braves, allowing a two-out single to Cecil Fielder.

With nothing to cheer for, frustrated Yankees fans took to running on the field in the later innings. In fact, five of them touched second base, more people than the Yankees' offense put there. The game ended with a small section of Braves family members and friends chanting and chopping behind home plate.

It was the kind of neat, efficient performance that prompted the Yankees to court Maddux when he became a free agent after the 1992 season.

put out of reach.

From the start of the 67th minute, the Minutewoman offense exploded all over the Lady Rams, as they picked up three goals in two minutes and some change. Freshman forward Emma Kurowski notched the first tally in 247 minutes of action for UMass, as she made the score 1-0 on an assist from sophomore Robin Smith. Senior defender Erin Lynch was the catalyst for the score, as she moved the ball through the center of the field to an overlapping Smith on the left side, chipping a pass to Kurowski on the far post.

At the 68-minute mark, senior midfielder Amy Powell registered her second goal of the season, as she fought off a challenge to the left side of keeper Kim Kasper, rifling her goal off the far right post.

A minute and two seconds later, senior midfielder Sandy Shimogaki and Kurowski combined to serve freshman forward Kate Webb her fourth goal of the season, capping the three goal run in fine fashion at the 69:02 mark. The Westfield native, and former St. Mary's star, made a nice move from the center of the penalty area to the left, and shot past Kasper to the right.

In the last minute, the Minutewomen finally scored off of one of their eight corner kicks, as junior defender Erica Iverson finished the scoring, and the Lady Rams, off with the final tally in this 4-0 win.

ening my very life today. If I don't get some shelter, boy, I'm gonna' fade away.

Lord, it was awful out there.

Yet, this horrible day proved to be a blessing in disguise for the young league. The sheets of water that ripped through Foxboro Stadium, failed to stop a crowd large enough to fill Fenway from coming outside (a victory in itself) to watch a game that didn't involve a local team, on a football Sunday with the Patriots in action.

Further helping the cause, was that ABC beamed no shots across the nation of miserable fans shivering and sitting on their hands. Instead jovial, albeit drenched people crowded the stadium, beating their drums, blowing their whistles and tooting their horns, mostly in support of United.

The raucous atmosphere generated by the legions of United fans who had made the journey from Washington D.C. to watch their team's march to the title, perhaps more than their presence itself amid often biblical downpours, spoke volumes about the future of the MLS.

What also bodes well for the league was the diversity of the crowd at MLS Cup '96. Fans rooted for their sides, but also for the players of their nationalities. A sea of Mexican flags flew when Campos, a member of the Mexican national team, made a save for the Galaxy, even from United fans. Bolivians cheered D.C.'s Marco Antonio Etcheverry, the match's MVP, and an army of Salvadorian flags flew in support of native-son Raul Diaz Arce.

The gate attendance of 34,643 was impressive in and of itself. Just over 27,000 showed up on Sunday for an NFL game in Tempe, Arizona, although some in Phoenix might tell you that the Arizona Cardinals are only the second best football team that calls Sun Devil Stadium home right now.

Almost more than bona fide fan support though, the MLS needed a match for the ages, something that none of the league's clever marketers could provide. With the regular- season champion Galaxy comfortably on top 2-0 with 17 minutes to play it seemed that the United players could not provide it either.

What followed was a winner-take-all finish any league would be proud to boast as its own. The Super Bowl last had drama in 1991, and Game 7 of last week's National League Championship Series hardly approached Dr. Seuss levels of suspense, let alone Sherlock Holmes.

United, and former Virginia men's coach Bruce Arena, sent Tony Sanneh and Shawn Medved into the match in the second half. Not long after, Etcheverry delighted Bolivian and D.C. United fans alike when he served a perfect ball to Sanneh to make it a 2-1 match in the 73rd minute.

Determined, United fought through the Galaxy defense, Medved scoring on a third-chance rebound after a pair of Campos saves and with six minutes to play, the score was improbably tied, and headed to the netherworld of sudden- death overtime, where legends are made in a split-second, and as for victory, the Stones reminded us...

It's just a shot away. It's just a shot away.

Just 3:25 into the extra session, Etcheverry served a corner right onto Eddie Pope's head, giving the league, and D.C. fans a tangible moment that will stand the test of time.

When I look back on Sunday's match, I'm not sure if I'll remember that fantastic finish or the weather more.

The point is moot to MLS officials though. The fact is that I'll remember MLS Cup '96, and that's enough for them.

talk to Red Sox management. This is not good. Like we need our best player disgruntled and annoyed. The front office wants to clear the air with Mo about their recent decisions, namely the axing of popular manager Kevin Kennedy. But, the Hit Dog just wants to let his bat do the talking from now on.

Vaughn spoke out earlier in the year about the team's lack of commitment to bring aboard more talent, and the Sox have already missed the boat on Brian McRae who just re-signed with the maligned Cubbies.

The Sox couldn't muster up $10,000 to extend Frank White's contract. White, another well-liked, intelligent coach, resigned as the first base coach and fielding instructor.

On a positive note, the Sox lured pitching coach Joe Kerrigan away from the Expos. He has the potential to be a mainstay in the Sox dugout, and would work well with former colleague Tim Johnson (hint, hint Danny boy).

UM swamps Rams in 2 minutes; wins by 4

By Jorma Kansonen
Collegian Staff

If the No. 11 Massachusetts women's soccer game against No. 4 University of Connecticut this past Saturday could be considered New Age, yesterday's game versus the Lady Rams of Fordham (6–5–2, 2–1–1 in the Atlantic 10) could be considered a giant leap backwards into the Dark Ages.

FORDAM	0

The Minutewomen (11–2–1, 5–0–1 A–10) jumped back into their formidable A–10 schedule yesterday in the Bronx, as they had to get psyched up for an opponent who they beat last season by a mere margin of seven goals. UMass was expected to march all over Fordham at Edward's Parade, and they did, as UMass came away with a 4–0 win.

The away game, after a tough loss, might be accountable for the goal difference between '95 and '96, but the fact is that Fordham could not have gotten any worse from last season's first–year 5–15 record (1–13 A–10), but at any rate, better in some contexts. The fact of the matter was that the field that Eddie made was feeling the effects of Lily, as the after–effects of last weekend's hurricane left the Parade a rain–dampened mess.

For coach Jim Rudy, the cards seemed to be stacked against his club this day, but the team was able to pull through and come away with the convincing win.

"It was nice, because we were a bit fatigued and tired coming into the game, and we came through," Rudy said. "It wasn't a pretty game, but we still played fairly well, considering the slippery field.

"We played in a very bizarre area, which was very swampy. There were some very rowdy Fordham fans there, and we didn't get any breaks from the officials."

After two consecutive matches where the UMass offense was shut out — 2–0 losses to Dartmouth and Connecticut — a team like Fordham should at least have been a blast of fresh air for the Minutewomen. But after the half, the 1995 A–10 champions were tied up with the 1995 A–10 cellar dwellers at nil. Five periods of scoreless play had gone and passed UMass by the break, but in a two–minute span in the second half, the game was

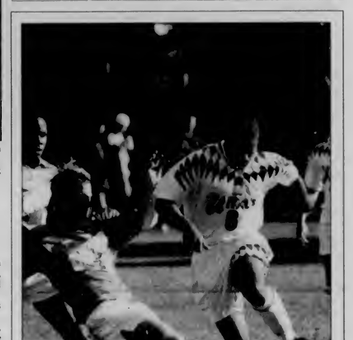
United reigns in MLS Cup
Thrilling final shines through

FOXBORO — I suppose there's something oddly appropriate in the fact that as I pulled into Foxboro Stadium's main parking lot for Sunday's MLS Cup final, WWRX, Providence's classic rock station, was playing the Rolling Stones' "Gimme Shelter."

Leigh Torbin

Whether it is used in reference to either the remnants of Hurricane Lily which swept through southeastern Massachusetts on Sunday, or the late barrage of D.C. United goals, the word "rain" applied perfectly; regardless of whether you happen to be beseiged Los Angeles Galaxy goalkeeper Jorge Campos, or any one of the 34,643 drenched fans who bore witness to Major League Soccer's inaugural championship match.

Everyone was seeking shelter at some point on Sunday.



For a league maligned like the MLS was in its freshman season on the American sporting scene, its first championship match had to be a perfect showcase. ABC viewers around the country and the world needed to see more than a 0-0 draw played before apathetic fans. The PR staff at MLS needed Sunday to be perfect.

What they got was a day that belonged in the movie Waterworld. A towel the size of Connecticut couldn't have sopped up all the water that flowed through the stadium's concourses like the mighty Mississippi. Meanwhile, the almost unplayable pitch itself was lost under puddles of standing water large enough to engulf a third–world nation.

So, as I sat huddled in section 107, the wet red plastic of my complimentary rain poncho's hood clinging like Saran Wrap to my face amidst gale force winds, the words of Mick Jagger that I had heard while still in my car warm, dry and unexposed to the elements, never escaped me.

Ooooh, see the storm is threat-

Men's water polo sinks deeply in California

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

The good news for the Minutemen water polo team is: they went out to California — the mecca of collegiate water polo — and came away with a win. The bad news: they played five games over the weekend.

Like at an all–you–can–eat buffet, the Minutemen's plate was over–flowing. UMass coach Russ Yarworth lined up five of the country's top 20 teams for the Minutemen, including recently ousted No. 1 and defending NCAA champion, UCLA which fell all the way to No. 2 in the rankings behind Southern California.

The No. 14 UMass polo squad started the weekend by swimming off against 16th–ranked Santa Clara, and grabbing their only win of the trip, doubling up the Broncos, 8–4.

Sophomore Gabriel Marrero's three goals helped the Minutemen to sprint out to a 5–1 advantage in the first half, and UMass cruised from that point. Top–scorer Brian Stahl notched a pair of scores in the winning effort.

Yarworth decided to start freshman Richard Huntley in net for the first contest and was not disappointed as the youngster from San Juan, Puerto Rico blocked 11 Santa Clara shots.

"It was a good way to start the trip, but everything went downhill from there," Yarworth said.

Things didn't really go downhill, they went down into a bottomless pit.

After the Minutemen hung with No. 9 (tied with UC–Davis) UC–San Diego for the first two periods, UMass tied the game early in the fourth at four. But, before they could say Final Four, the Minutemen were down 10–4 as UCSD rattled off six unanswered goals. San Diego tacked on four goals in the fourth to seal the 14–5 romp.

J.C. Limardo led the Minutemen with a pair of goals while Paul Engin and Huntley combined for a mere four saves on 18 UCSD attempts.

"It's very frustrating; we just ended up falling apart," Yarworth said. "We have some work to do as far as intensity goes."

The Minutemen continued to follow the same dangerous pattern — quick start, slow finish — that has plagued them in many matches so far this season in their next contest against UC–Davis.

Massachusetts finished a quarter of play even up with Davis at five, but the next two periods were a disaster for the Minutemen, as UC–Davis exploded for nine goals to UMass's two in the second and third.

Davis held on in the fourth, winning 16–10.

Stahl continued on his frantic scoring pace in the loss, netting seven points on five goals and a two–pointer. The super–soph from Wyomissing, Pa. is still on pace to become just the third Minuteman to score 100 goals in a single season.

Just when the Minutemen thought things couldn't get any worse, they hit rock bottom.

Playing tournament host No. 12 Claremont, UMass had a contest that it could win, but the Minutemen came out flat, and stayed that way throughout the match, getting thoroughly trounced by Claremont, 12–4.

Huntley made a career–high 12 saves in the game, but his mates in the water didn't put nearly as much pressure on the opposing goal as they felt. Marrero was the only positive offensively, scoring twice. Senior co–captain Ron Gonen found the back of the net for the first time in a while.

Finally, with absolutely no pressure on them, UMass went up against the Bruins of UCLA, defending NCAA champs.

Yarworth's charges played extremely well, for the most part, but were simply over–matched by a superior team as the Bruins used an 11–3 first half margin to coast to a 14–6 victory.

Freshman Rich Slinglulf led the attack with three goals; he continues to fill in adequately for the injured Marc Staudenbauer. Marrero scored two more, and finished with 10 goals on the weekend. Engin made seven saves.

UM women's XC takes fifth

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

After an unexpected third–place finish last week behind powerhouses Penn State and Georgetown at the Paul Short Invitational, the Massachusetts women's cross country team had some huge shoes to fill when they headed out to Boston's Franklin Park for the New England Championships.

Running in a field of 30–plus teams, three of which are ranked in the top 15, UMass could only realistically hope to finish in the top five. Running their finest race of the season, UMass (172 points) grabbed that fifth spot only finishing behind top–ranked Providence College (38 points), No. 15 Dartmouth College (46 points), No. 7 Boston College (100 points) and rival Brown University (110 points).

"The entire team ran a great race," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "I couldn't have been more proud."

Several Minutewomen astronomically improved their times from last year's trip to Franklin Park

UMass' standout runner Rebecca Donaghue was one of them. Last year, Donaghue ran the course at 17:54. This year's 17:14 finish not only broke her course record, but was her fastest time of the season.

Donaghue ran alongside some of the nation's elite runners this week, finishing fifth overall.

Donaghue is hoping to qualify for the NCAAs next month. If she continues to perform the way she did this week, she should have little trouble accomplishing that feat.

Once again, Katie Greenia and the rest of the Minutewomen carried the team through the middle of the pack.

"Katie ran the greatest race of her life," LaFreniere said.

Greenia took her time of 19:09 from last year, and chopped a whole minute off of it, finishing 21st at 18:09. "Christy Martin was not feeling very well," LaFreniere said. "She was tired, but I was still happy with her performance."

Martin finished 37th, with a time of 18:34.

Finishing fourth for UMass was Molly Dunlap, who duplicated her outstanding performance from two weeks ago, finishing once again under 19 minutes (52nd, 18:52).

Beyond the top five, the Minutewomen received a huge boost from the performance of Tracy Meagher. Last year, Meagher ran the Franklin Park course at a robust 20:29. Last week, Meagher's hard work and determination finally paid off when she finished with a remarkable time of 19:05.

"Tracy has been one of the biggest improvements on this team," LaFreniere said. "She's really closing the gap, and we'll need her help down the home stretch."

Next week the Minutwomen will defend their title at the Atlantic 10 Championships at Van Cortland Park in the Bronx, New York.

"The kids are running with a lot of heart," LaFreniere said. "You really need that in cross country."

As for the competition, UMass is really only looking out for a Virginia Tech team that could surprise some people. "The key to our team is to stay healthy," LaFreniere said. "At this time of the year, there's no room for error."

UM men run sixth in Boston

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team took sixth place Friday at the New England Cross Country Championships, held in Boston's Franklin Park. The team finished with a total of 158 points.

Coach Ken O'Brien's top finisher was senior Matt Behl, who hails from Granville, who finished 22nd overall, with a time of 24:46.

He was closely followed by another senior, Mike Maceiko, from Deer Park, N.Y., who finished 27th, with a time of 24:52. Finishing third for UMass was Jon Way of Marston Mills, also a senior, who was 31st overall, with a time of 24:58.

"I hate to take [Behl] and [Maceiko] for granted, but the three of them, Jon Way, Paul Blodorn and Ryan Carrara were key for us; they did a great job," O'Brien said.

Jones linked to Mick in Classic

So, Spanker fans, I'm supposed to be getting off your backs, and giving you credit...

The Fall Classic got off to a rather inauspicious start Sunday evening when the Atlanta Braves ravaged the hallowed confines of the House that Ruth Built, spanking the junior circuit entry, 12–1.

Bravos' legend–to–be Andruw Jones immortalized himself by hitting a pair of bombs in helping to pull the National League champs out to a 10–0 lead.

What is so spectacular about this feat is Jones' age — 19 years and change. What were you doing when you were 19? Some of you don't know yet. Some of you were watching a peer become the youngest player to ever hit a World Series home run Sunday night. Some of you were voting for Dan Quayle for Vice President.

FRED HURLBRINK on Baseball

In a super–ironic twist — a gift from God for a columnist — the previous mark was held by late pin–stripe legend Mickey Mantle, the most prolific home run–hitter in series history. Mantle was just over 20–years old when he knocked his first of 18 championship clouts and would have celebrated his 65th birthday on Sunday.

Also in the irony department is the fact that Jones even started the game. The Braves have a fairly decent young left fielder in the person of Ryan Klesko, but thanks to the DH– rule in the American League, Atlanta skipper Bobby Cox was able to move Klesko — a graduate of the Mike Greenwell school of left field — to DH and put the speedy, athletic Jones in left.

So, where's the irony you ask? So–called baseball purists are categorically against the new playoff structure, but if it weren't for that, the alternating home–field advantage wouldn't be in effect, and the Yankees wouldn't have been the home team last night, which would mean Klesko would have started in left field, and Jones would have been on the bench. Got all that?

Now, all these "purists" have Jones' heroism to revel over for the next few months, but they might not have if it weren't for the new Wild Card playoff alignment. Right? Right.

As for you Spankees fans, one word sums up your ungrateful, pathetic, miserable, ignorant showing... oh I said one word, didn't I? Sick.

I was disgusted to see the uncountable amount of empty seats in Yankee Stadium late in the game.

Yeah, the Bombers were getting bombed; Andy (the Cy who award?) Pettitte was totally embarrassed by the barrage of Braves hits; the Spankees were playing Little Rascal defense; on top of all that the Star Spangled Banner was awful.

So, yeah the game was a wash. The Spanks were annihilated, but this is the World Series. These are — apparently — the two top teams in baseball, and the Bronx "fans" just abandoned their team. A team that fought a lot of adversity to get to this point, to bring the World Series back to its second home for the first time since 1981.

As much as I am required (as a Red Sox fan) to despise the Spanks, I would love to see a World Series game in live 3–D action. I would even trek through the filth and stench of inner–city New York to see a game at Spankee Stadium. And, because of my affiliation with the Sox, history dictates that I have about as much chance to see a Boston World Series as Bob Dole has to see a Brooklyn Dodger game next season.

To my point: Spankee fans obviously don't appreciate what they have this season, and consequently, they don't deserve to be a part of the greatest sporting event in the world.

Brain Buster: Which pitcher has started the most Game Ones in World Series history? (Hint: This question is ripped off from Sunday night's Aflac trivia.)

Answer later in this column.

• Things just keep getting worse in the Land of the Red Sock.

All–Universe first baseman Mo Vaughn won't even

U.S. Official: progress in Hebron talks

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) — After a brief crisis, U.S.–mediated peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians were back on track yesterday and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said, "a deal was very close to completion."

Talks lasted into Tuesday evening at a Jerusalem hotel, and Israel Radio said a deal on Israel's long–delayed pullout from the West Bank town of Hebron might be announced during the night.

The sides reached agreement early Tuesday morning on the future administration of civil affairs in Hebron and were close to agreeing on the security arrangements, Israeli reports said.

"I hope it will be finished quickly," Netanyahu said of the agreement. He told reporters that a meeting between him and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat would be "desirable" when an accord is reached.

But despite the optimism of the Israeli side, the Palestinians have said they do not want to settle for a deal that resolves only the question of Hebron. They also want Israel to stop expansion of Jewish settlements, ease the closure of Palestinian areas, release

Palestinian prisoners and resolve other outstanding issues.

Question remains: Did Simpson do it?

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — It's a different courtroom with different lawyers, different jurors and a different standard of proof. The question, however, is the same: Did O.J. Simpson kill Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman?

Opening statements begin Wednesday in the wrongful–death lawsuit brought against Simpson by the Brown and Goldman families. They are demanding unspecified damages from Simpson for the slayings, of which he was acquitted in criminal court a year ago.

The lawyers in the civil case have both the advantage — and disadvantage — of having seen the evidence unfold in court already.

"The prosecutors were blindsided last time," said Laurie evenson, dean of Loyola University Law School. " This time there ill be fewer surprises to deal with."

Among other things, the allegations of racism against Detective ark Fuhrman will no longer carry the element of surprise. It was uhrman who reported finding the bloody glove at Simpson's estate. impson's lawyers are expected to sound the same themes that ehoed so powerfully at his murder trial: claims that he was the victim of botched or tampered-with evidence as well as a racist police frame-up on Fuhrman's part.

"Their case will focus on police-bashing. It worked before and they have every reason to believe, based on jury responses, it will work again," Levenson said.

Making UMass a safer place
Students volunteer time to upgrade quality of security

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

While most University of Massachusetts students spend their evenings studying, working or socializing, a select group of students devote their time and energy to ensure the safety of all campus residents.

Student Security is comprised of about 500 student employees. About 400 are receptionists — 42 work at the security desks in residence halls each night.

In charge of the receptionists are 30–35 supervisors, who also serve as walking escorts on campus or as dispatchers for the driving and walking escorts.

Seven head supervisors monitor the whole operation, both in the police station and out on campus patrol.

Public Security Officers (PSOs) Michael Rucks and Howard Walsh, under the leadership of Deputy Chief of Security Lawrence Holmes, oversee the nightly operations in the station.

On Oct. 11, the Friday night of Columbus Day weekend, Rucks supervised the night's security staff.

"I oversee the operations, but my job is made possible by them [student employees]," Rucks said. "We have a great crop of students this semester.

"It is a tough job, being out alone at night with a radio. Student Security supervisors serve as the eyes and ears of Public Safety, and they do a good job," Rucks said.

Chief of Police John Luippold said he is very proud of the students who work for Security.

"Students within Student Security are very dedicated and work long hours, which are not the greatest hours, and are working some of the lower paid jobs on campus," Luippold said.

"From the receptionists to the supervisors, I am very impressed in what they've been able to do," Luippold said.

A night in the station

Each night, a student head supervisor runs the security services both in and out of the station.

On this particular night, Luke Sullivan, a senior computer science major, is in charge of operations.

"I come in at 6:30 [p.m.] and collect equipment for supervisors — keys, radios and paperwork," Sullivan said. "I also look at the paperwork for that night and see if there are any problems, and check the log book."

Sullivan said the log book contains information about recent events and notices about people who should not be entering certain buildings, so supervisors can be aware in case a problem arises.

Sullivan looks out for potential disturbances, and keeps track of all buildings that are "209A" — ones with residents who have restraining orders. All 209A buildings and all– female residence halls must be staffed by security receptionists each night.

The supervisor's assistant (this night it is Faith Seddon) is responsible for finding replacement receptionists for ones who do not

Kahoe guilty of Ruby Ridge coverup

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A former FBI headquarters manager was accused yesterday of obstructing justice by destroying all traces of an internal critique of the bureau's deadly 1992 siege at Ruby Ridge, Idaho.

The apparent plea bargain with E. Michael Kahoe might lead to coverup charges against some of the four other suspended FBI officials who remain under investigation for their role in shootings at the remote cabin of white separatist Randy Weaver.

These include former Deputy Director Larry Potts, who supervised the case from headquarters.

A one–count felony information was filed by federal prosecutors here against Kahoe, who headed the FBI's violent crimes section at the time of the standoff. The charge carries a top penalty of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The filing of a criminal information rather than a grand jury indictment usually means the defendant has agreed to plead guilty and cooperate with investigators. A Justice Department official, requesting anonymity, could not offer any reason for this case to depart from that practice.

No court date was set immediately.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter had no comment. Kahoe could immediately be reached.

During the FBI's August 1992 standoff with Weaver, a bureau sniper shot and killed Weaver's wife, Vicki, and wounded Weaver and a friend, Kevin L. Harris. The FBI got involved after Weaver's son, Samuel, and a deputy U.S. marshal, William F. Degan, were killed in gunfire Aug. 21 as marshals scouted for a way to arrest the elder Weaver for failing to appear in court on gun–sale charges.

The government needs to prosecute those who issued the rules of engagement that resulted in the death of these people," said Weaver's lawyer, Gerry Spence. "The federal government is good at diverting our attention away from the real case" and toward a coverup case.

The government charged that between January and April 1993, Kahoe destroyed a written FBI "after action critique" so that it would not be available to prosecutors when Weaver and Harris were tried on charges of killing Degan. They were later acquitted.

The Constitution requires prosecutors to give the defense any government information that might help clear defendants, in this case, Weaver and Harris.

The government charged that Kahoe not only destroyed his copies of the report but ordered an unidentified subordinate at FBI headquarters "to destroy all copies of the Ruby Ridge after action critique and to make it appear as if the Ruby Ridge after action critique never existed."

A key issue is who approved the controversial "shoot on sight" policy for snipers at the siege. Potts and the FBI's field commander at Ruby Ridge, Eugene Glenn, have disagreed under oath over whether Potts approved it. Glenn claimed Potts ordered that agents "could and should" shoot to kill any armed adult male spotted in the open, but Potts denied saying "should."

Swift visits UMass; focuses on Education

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

With the November election approaching, State Senator Jane Swift (R–North Adams) attempted to bolster her bid for the first congressional district of Massachusetts by appearing in a forum, addressing education and other issues relevant to students, yesterday, in the Union Video Center (Ch. 19) studios at the University of Massachusetts.

In the forum, hosted by Jason Vecchio student coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), Swift said that she will fight to maintain funding for education as long as it is accompanied by a balanced budget.

She said that balancing the budget is crucial to the economic well–being of students after they graduate.

"I fully support the Pell grant programs and the college loan and scholarships program at the federal level," said Swift, who acknowledged that her college education would not have been possible without loan programs.

She added, "I have a moral responsibility to make sure that those same type of dollars are available for students like me and you who want to access a quality higher education."

According to Swift, the three most important issues facing students are the quality and affordibility of education and the economic state of the country when they graduate.

Swift said that eliminating the Flooding wreaks havoc on eastern part of state

By Dave Howland
Associated Press

BOSTON — The faucet remained open this morning, as more rain fell during a morning commute already made tricky by several road closings.

As of this morning, Route 9 in Wellesley was closed westbound and only one lane was open eastbound; Route 2 in Arlington had just one lane open in each direction; Route 3A in Billerica was closed at the Shawsheen River; and Route 1 was closed near the Topsfield Fairgrounds.

Weather forecasters expect scattered showers today, with some clearing tonight and tomorrow morning. Those new showers only will add to the record rainfall that has swamped Massachusetts the last several days.

Water lapped at the tops of flood–control dams, sump pumps continued to run at full blast and dozens of people awoke in emergency shelters this morning in the wake of last weekend's rainstorm.

As two days of record rains receded into memory, officials worried that the runoff would flood already swollen rivers. Flood warnings were in effect along the Charles River in Dover, the Nashua River in East Pepperell and Concord River in Lowell. State transportation officials warned of delays in the greater Boston area. Flooding has closed parts of Route 2 in Arlington and Cambridge, and Route 9 in Wellesley.

Meanwhile, smaller creeks that had flooded back yards and basements receded, as residents began to assess the damage. "The bottom line, it was a pretty darn good storm," said Walter Drag, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service. "It was a major player."

The weather service reported that 10.75 inches of rain had fallen in Woburn by noon Monday. Typical fall storms bring one to two inches, and the average rainfall for Massachusetts in October is 3.3 inches.

Boston posted a record for rainfall during any 24–hour period in October, with 6.66 inches falling at Logan International Airport between 5 a.m. Sunday and 5 a.m. Monday, the weather service reported.

It was also the second–highest rainfall ever during a 24–hour period. The record was set on Aug. 18–19, 1955, when Hurricane Diane dumped 8.4 inches on Boston.

The latest storm totals reported around the state were: Boston, 7.92 inches; Newburyport, 12.05 inches; Lexington, 9.84; North Andover, 9.75; Worcester, 3.54; Rockport, 8.58; Hingham, 7.02; Plymouth, 5.06; Chatham, 4.40.

About 80 people in Amesbury spent the night at the local high school after they were forced from their homes by flooding, said Don Carlton, assistant operations officer with the state's Emergency Management Agency.

The storm's only reported casualty was a Holyoke woman, who died in a two–car head–on collision early Sunday. Police Sgt. Robert Wagner said heavy rain was a factor in the accident on a curvy stretch of Route 202 covered with leaves and pine needles. Hundreds of residents were evacuated Monday in Winchester as water flowed over the top of a concrete–and–earthworks dam in Woburn. Officials feared the flood control dam could give way, sending a wall of water downstream into Winchester.

Monday in Peabody, water up to four feet deep swirled through the streets, submerging stranded cars. Mark Nalesnick, co–owner of McNamara's Liquors, said there was six feet of water in the store's basement, and the sales floor was under a foPumps for flooded basements were in short supply. Bob Blumberg, manager of True Value Hardware in Lynn, said he had gotten more than 500 calls for pumps, but had only a dozen to sell.

In Quincy, a manhole cover blew out on Armory Street, sending sewage flooding through the streets and into some basements. Gov. William F. Weld declared a state of emergency in Norfolk, Suffolk, Middlesex, Essex and Plymouth counties, easing the way for federal aid.

Service on the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority's Green Line was interrupted by flooding of the Kenmore Station subway tunnel after the Muddy River overflowed. The agency was running buses instead.

At the flood's peak, water was over the top of the station's escalators and lapping against the token–seller's booth upstairs. By Monday it was subsiding. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers brought in pumps, but MBTA officials did not know when the station would reopen.

Arlene Margolis, spokeswoman for the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency, said autumn leaves increased flooding everywhere.

The state has established a toll-free number staffed by volunteers who can answer questions about flooding and other storm-related concerns. The number is 800-293-4031.

Corrections

In the Oct. 21 issue, the feature photo of "Casino Night" on page 2 incorrectly cited the organization sponsoring the event, which was the Asian–American Student Association.

In the Oct. 22 issue, the graph which appeared on the Multicultural Affairs page incorrectly states the Jewish and Palestinian population ratio in the subdistricts of Jaffa and Jerusalem. In Jaffa, the population of Palestinians was 29 percent, Jewish 71 percent. In Jerusalem, the Jewish population was 38 percent, Palestinian 62 percent. A corrected map will appear on the Oct. 29 Developing Nations page.

The Oct. 22 Campus Police Log printed incorrect police information which listed the driver of a motorcycle involved in an accident as Timothy Gould. Gould was the PVTA driver involved. The motorcycle was driven by John Soares.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

come to work. She also records pertinent information from Resident Assistants.

Sullivan hands out assignments to the six security supervisors at a briefing, held at 7:30 p.m. After he assures that all of the night's positions have been filled, he goes out onto the field at 9:30 p.m.

The head supervisor is also responsible for training and monitoring supervisors, as well as ensuring the safety of receptionists.

"Last year a receptionist was assaulted at her desk, and Larry Holmes told her to take as much time off as she needed," Sullivan said.

Supervisors are told not to intervene in potentially dangerous situations, but to radio the police immediately.

The head supervisor also makes sure the escort service dispatcher is set to go for the evening.

The other end of the line

Helen Andrews, a senior political science and legal studies major, is in her fourth year of employment at Student Security.

As both a supervisor and dispatcher, Andrews has logged many hours in and out of the police station. She admits that her position on the receiving end of the campus escort phone line is the most challenging aspect of her job.

"There are some days I love it, some days I hate it," Andrews said of working dispatch. "I've been threatened, and called a Nazi racist bitch because I offered someone a walking escort."

The greatest amount of tension between students and the dispatcher is generated from the overwhelming demand for an escort van, as opposed to a walking escort, Andrews said.

"Last night a guy called who wanted to go from Gorman [Residence Hall] to Hamlin [Residence Hall], and I offered him a walking escort," Andrews said. "He said, 'I guess I have the wrong color skin to get a van, you...' and hung up."

It is the policy of the entire escort service to prioritize people waiting for escorts, alone, in dark and remote areas. Parking lots, being quite a distance from the center of campus, are often serviced first by the vans.

According to Andrews, no student is ever denied an escort, but students in the safe locations travelling short distances are recommended a walking escort.

"The escort service can't be everything to everybody," Andrews said. "It is not a taxi service. I treat it as a safety service.

"If someone needs to get somewhere safely, we make sure they get there," Andrews said.

Andrews has encountered both verbal abuse and amusing situations from students who do not understand the escort service priorities.

"They [students] swear us out, but we've heard it all already," Andrews said. "We've become very thick–skinned.

"Guys call up trying to sound like a girl because they think they will get a van faster," Andrews said.

"My biggest beef is when people think they are paying for the escort service. The funding is from Public Safety, not from tuition," Andrews said.

Public Safety has two vans, and alternates the use of a car when necessary.

"Between walking and driving, we can transport about 70 people on a weekend night. It poured last night and we did 83," Andrews said.

Andrews said that intoxicated students generally do not cause problems on the phone lines.

"Most drunk people are more willing to walk. They are more honest, and will tell me, 'I've been drinking'.

"People who want to go drink are the problem, because they are all dressed up and don't want to walk," Andrews said.

Though Andrews and other dispatchers work late nights in a small office with nothing but a ringing telephone, she says working for Student Security has been a rewarding experience.

"I came here as a very naive freshman, and I am going to leave with knowledge and managerial skills," Andrews said.

Driving the van

After the student dispatcher fields telephone calls, he or she radios the pick–up locations to the escort vans, which are driven by PSOs.

On this particular night, PSO Peggy Koscinski was behind the wheel of the escort van, responding to the small amount of escort requests the station received on the holiday weekend.

"I love this job," Koscinski said. "I love to drive around and get to know people."

Koscinski admits that there are some students who complain about the wait for the van on busy nights (11 p.m. – 1 a.m. is the busiest time), but overall she enjoys the interaction with people.

"There are a lot of nice people who ride," Koscinski said. "But there are some who don't even talk to me. Sometimes they try to light a cigarette or play with the radio. Drunk people try to flag me down, and I can't stop to pick them up.

"To me it's a great service, the best you can offer. I've met hundreds of really nice people who know me by name, and I will know where they are going," Koscinski said.

John Mado, a junior HRTA major took a ride in the escort van that night. He said that he frequently uses the escort service to "get from point A to point B" quickly and safely.

"Sometimes it's good, but occasionally they [vans] tend not to show," Mado said.

"We've never not shown," Koscinski said. "Sometimes we get there and students don't show up, or I'll get to calls 15 minutes behind and they leave.

"I've been driving escort for three years and I've never not shown," Koscinski said.

According to Koscinski, if the student in need of a ride is not present when the van arrives, the driver waits about ten minutes.

Magalie Lamour, a senior political science/legal studies/Spanish major, also utilized the escort van that evening.

"I use it quite often and I have a severe back problem. The supervisors here help me out when the special service vans can't get to me," Lamour said.

"My experience so far has been very good," Lamour said.

Patrolling the campus

In between answering calls for walking escorts, supervisors monitor the residential areas they are assigned to, checking to make sure the security receptionists are at their posts.

Supervisor Shawn Steeves, a senior microbiology major, was assigned to a portion of Southwest Residential Area. He was accompanied by then supervisor–in–training, Fred Farson, a sophomore.

"This is my fourth semester working for Security," Steeves said. "I really enjoy this job. I like being able to get outdoors."

Steeves and Farson distribute keys to receptionists to unlock the security desks, then they travel from dorm to dorm, making sure receptionists are performing their duties.

The supervisors also lock all of the doors in each residence hall and make sure the alarm system is activated.

Along the way, Steeves notes a few broken doors whose alarm systems cannot be activated, and includes this in his nightly report.

Despite the fact that the tower area in Southwest has been problematic recently with regards to objects being thrown out of windows, Steeves said he "never feels endangered" while on patrol.

"Our problems are mostly people who have had a few too many drinks and try to enter a building without their ID," Steeves said.

Steeves said people who become violent are reported to the police.

Working for Student Security has been touted by some as a thankless job, but the employees do not feel that way. Both Sullivan and Andrews said the staff members have formed close friendships over the years in the police station.

Department of Education would free up money to help pay for programs that directly benefit students.

"Instead of spending the money on a bureaucracy in Washington, the money can be put in to more funding for scholarships and loans, into more books and supplies, and teacher salaries," Swift said.

According to Swift, balancing the budget will benefit education and "tough economic choices will make sure that when you [students] graduate, you graduate into a growing economy," she said.

She added that the "tough economic choices" can come from the bureaucracies in government and not programs like student loans, grants and HeadStart, a program that prepares under–privileged children for school.

The recent SGA–led voter registration drive ended with a total of approximately 8,000 students registered to vote. According to Jaime S.nith, student coordinator of UMass Votes and panelist of the forum, about 80 percent of the registrants declared themselves as independent.

Swift said that the independent status of many students can be attributed to the "disaffection of voters in general with both major [political] parties."

She specifically pointed to, what she believes, as the trend of Democrats becoming too liberal and Republicans becoming too conservative. Most individuals have moved more towards the center, she said.

"I think that you [students] have to evaluate candidates based not on the party labels, but what they stand for," Swift said.

She added, "I think I put forth common sense, moderate approaches to issues [and to] invest in education that will pay dividends down the road."

Commenting on the what is perceived as cynicism, among students, in the political process, Swift said that students are not cynical, they just do not trust what the politicians say and "are probably intelligent because a lot of people [politicians] promise things that they then end up not doing."

"We have been trying to focus our campaign on common sense pragmatic solutions and not climbing onto the give away the world and you can keep all your money kind of tax programs," said Swift, referring to Clinton's tax hike in 1993 and Dole's proposed 15 percent tax cut.

Unlike her Republican counterparts in Congress, Swift believes that Affirmative Action is necessary in the country because "we don't live in a race blind society. We need to equalize opportunity," she said.

Swift is running against incumbent Representative John Olver (D–Amherst). She graduated from Trinity College, Hartford in American Studies. She has been a member of the state Senate since 1990 and has served on committees such as Ways and Means and Education.

The next forum will be held with Olver on Oct. 28 in the Union Video Center's studio at 4 p.m. Student Government President Maurice Caston and the Collegian News Editor. Mike Elliott were members of the panel.

Students enjoy delicious apples

By Daniel E. Levenson
Collegian staff

University of Massachusetts Professor Duane Greene is speaking out about the wide variety of apples available for consumption.

In a recent press release Greene said, "don't always get that bag of Delicious. There are some wonderful eating experiences and wonderful cooking experiences out there, far beyond what you'll find in the super market."

There are approximately 6,000 varieties of apples, according to Greene, who supervises the growth of 250 at an experimental farm in Belchertown run by the University.

His research involves pest management and fruit storage and, in general, is aimed towards the consumer aspects of apple production.

According to students at UMass, a market does exist for Greene.

"I think apples are a delicious and healthy snack," said John Macuga, a sophomore history major.

Kevin McGrath, a junior in the School of Management said that he has eaten apples in the past and, that he probably will consume them again in the future. "I like them, they taste good. They're nutritious," McGrath said.

Brett Lindebury, a senior park management and arboriculture major, cited both the good and bad side of apple consumption.

"I like them a lot ," said Lindenbury, "They clean the junk off your teeth when you have stuff stuck in them."

But he also said that there can be a dangerous side to eating fruit is which may have been exposed to pesticides.

"I think you should know what's been sprayed on apples before you eat them," Lindenbury said.

Greene said that many students are simply not aware of how many types of apples exist. The list includes; Matsu, Gala–Go–Red, Fiesta, Honeycrisp, Pink Lady and Akane.

Greene said Cortland, Matsu, Delicious and Akane are the best choice for cooking.

People should remember to refrigerate apples, Greene said, because "they go downhill rapidly."

Why Carter should lead the U.N.

Martin F. Jones

On Dec. 31, 1996 the Secretary General of the United Nations, Boutros Boutros-Gali of Egypt will complete his first, and perhaps his final five-year term as the head of the world's most important and most powerful international organization. As it stands, the United States has vowed to veto any attempt to reappoint Boutros-Gali as U.N. chief, citing his ineffectiveness and failure to adequately reform the organization.

While many would question the importance of such a decision as the selection of the U.N. Secretary General, it must be stated nevertheless, that the future of global peace and stability may come to depend more and more in the coming years in the reliability of a strong mediating body such as the U.N., and even more importantly, a reformed U.N. that breaks from the traditional role of serving as an unchallenged mechanism which the United States has used to continue to reinforce its increasing global hegemony upon the world community.

Today, I'd like to endorse the idea of an American taking the helm of the U.N. in an unprecedented crusade to move the world community towards a new global order of peaceful conflict resolution. There is, of course, one man that comes to mind, a former commander in chief of the U.S. armed forces who is well-known and highly respected throughout the entire world, and has established a sturdy repoire among a number of developing nations: former president, Jimmy Carter.

James Earl Carter, the 39th president of the United States, may be remembered one day as the greatest diplomat the world has ever known. While he is best remembered for his handling of the 1979-1981 Iranian hostage crisis, Carter should also be noted for his remarkable foreign policy activity and achievements both during his administration and following his departure from the White House in 1981.

Moments after Ronald Reagan took the oath of office on Jan. 20, 1981, the final arrangements which had been successfully negotiated by Carter were executed for the release of 52 hostages whom had been held for over a year by the Iranian Government. With the election and inauguration of Reagan, the presidency of Jimmy Carter passed into history, as he would become former President Jimmy Carter--private citizen. In the wake of the Iranian hostage crisis, a stagnant economy and a failed presidential campaign, the question which presented itself was what the future held for the man who, for the previous four years, had been one of the most powerful men in the world.

During the waning months of his presidency, Jimmy Carter accepted a distinguished professorship at Emory University in Atlanta. Carter would later develop a strong relationship with the institution and would eventually choose the Emory campus as the site of the Carter Center, a private institution through which Carter would chart the peacemaking work of his post-presidential years.

In one version of a story recounted by his wife, Rosalyn, Carter woke up abruptly one night and spoke the words "conflict resolution" (Driemen, 1992, p.172). Rosalyn also recalled that Jimmy woke and said, "I know what we can do at the library. We can help develop a place to help people who want to resolve disputes" (Carter and Carter, 1987, p. 31). In 1982, the Jimmy Carter Presidential Library and Museum and The Carter Center of Emory University were founded.

For the past 15 years, Carter has taken up the challenge of making peace and has demonstrated through his activities that a former president can wield significant influence towards resolving armed conflicts and to building the foundations necessary for people to live in peace. As a former naval officer in the nuclear submarine program and later as commander in chief of the U.S. armed forces, Carter has always remained close to the potential and possibility of war. Because of these experiences, Carter clearly understands and can fully appreciate the devastating toll war inflicts on countries and people around the world. In a speech the 1992 Carter Center consultation that was entitled "Resolving Intra-National conflicts," he clearly articulated his views on war:

"War is bestial. It is inhuman. It violates basic human values and ignores laws designed over centuries, even millennia, that protect the rights of one person living adjacent to another" (Carter, "Human rights," 1992, p. 10). Here, Carter articulates the necessity of addressing the elimination of war as a means of resolving differences between peoples or countries.

Nov. 5, 1996 will mark the twentieth anniversary of Jimmy Carter's election as the 39th president of the United States. At the age of 72, Jimmy Carter has remained remarkably active on the world stage, and most would agree that he has been the most effective former president in U.S. history. As a peacemaker, Carter stands without rival, and holds the distinction of being the only U.S. president since Herbert Hoover (1929-1933) to head a presidential administration without ever utilizing military force.

The Iranian hostage crisis was peacefully negotiated to a close after 444 days, with the sole casualties being the eight U.S. servicemen who died during an aborted mission to rescue the hostages. The 1980 Soviet invasion Afghanistan was respectfully addressed by Carter through the initiation of a U.S. led boycott of the Summer Olympic games in Moscow that same year. Carter's greatest diplomatic triumph was the Camp David Accord, the Mideast peace agreement between Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin in which the first comprehensive peace accord between Israel and an Arab nation would be established. (This achievement would earn Carter the first of a series of nominations for the Nobel Peace Prize.)

In his 15 years since leaving the White House, Jimmy Carter has made a remarkable impact on world diplomacy. Through his Carter Center, President Carter has been called upon numerous times as a highly respected civilian to help mediate towards a peaceful resolution of a number of international disputes. In 1994, Jimmy Carter underscored the epileptic nature of the Clinton Administration's dealings with foreign policy challenges in Haiti, Bosnia and the Korean peninsula as he intervened as a mediator with varied degrees of success in each of those conflicted regions.

There is no question that Jimmy Carter has the experience, expertise, diplomatic skills, and international respectability to successfully lead the U.N. Few others have established the reputation of trustworthiness and reliability in international relations as Carter has during his White House administration and the subsequent years hence.

There is of course the dilemma of the U.S. being perceived as expanding its global hegemony if a former U.S. president were to succeed Boutros-Gali as U.N. chief. However, many would argue that based upon his record, Carter would actually be the best equipped to keep in check such imperial machinations as they've been executed by the Clinton Administration (e.g. Helms-Burton Act). One thing is definitely clear: Jimmy Carter experience as a peacemaker makes him the best choice for Secretary General, holding the greatest promise to restore the U.N. to its original mission of maintaining peace and international cooperation as the world marches forward into the 21st century.

So much for diversity

Ann Rubinstein

I have been living in my dorm for almost a year now. I like it. I don't break any of the important rules. I respect my neighbors. I attend floor meetings. I am a good resident. There is a rumor going around that I might get kicked out. In fact, the rumor says that everyone in the dorm will be forced to adjust to new housing next year. Everyone, that is, except for the Asian students who live there. From what I have heard they are planning on making my dorm all Asian next year.

Now as I said, this is only a rumor and probably is not true. Yet it is not beyond the stretch of the imagination. As of this semester the fourth floor of my building is reserved only for Asians. Some of my friends were kicked out of their rooms on the top floor for no reason other than the color of their skin. Other friends of mine were moved up there from other floors of building, against their will, because of their ethnicity. I think this is a form of discrimination and segregation.

If I wanted to live on an all white floor and requested that the school throw everyone off of my floor who was any other color, well, I think they might say no, the idea would be rejected in two seconds. Not only that, I would probably be given stern lectures on diversity, multiculturalism and racism. The school would feel tarnished for having even thought of the idea for those two seconds. Yet an all Asian floor is acceptable. There should not be a difference between the treatment of an idea for an all white floor and an all Asian floor.

Not that I have the desire to live on an all white floor. Living in a dorm is one of the great experiences of college. You do not know your neighbors until you get there and in most situations they turn out to be rather different from you. You do not have to be best friends with the people in the dorm. It is interesting though to get a taste of all different kinds of people out there.

My first semester at the University of Massachusetts I was dumped into an all girl dorm. It was not all that awful of a semester. I met some of my best friends and had a good time. The next semester when I moved into a co-ed dorm, I found out a lot more about college. I met all sorts of great people: guys, girls, Asians, whites, Americans, Europeans and more. People from all different backgrounds, some I could relate to, some I could not. It is all part of the college experience, meeting people from all walks of life.

The dorm is one place where you can hang out with all sorts of people. In real life though, most people usually hang out with people similar to them. It was pointed out to me recently that if you go into the D.C. and look around it is obvious that people segregate themselves. Certain races sit together, certain teams sit together, the students in R.O.T.C. sit together, the lunch ladies sit together. Not that this is an absolute rule, some races are a random mix of all sorts of people, but on the average, like sits with like. Take the D.C. as a small scale for what life is like. My point is in most parts of life, people end up associating with individuals similar to themselves.

Does all of life have to be like this though? Isn't it good to have diversity? Why do some of the Asian people on this campus feel as though all their life has to be separate from other cultures. I feel affronted when they do not want me on their floor. Would it be so bad to have me living next door or down the floor? Say "hi" to me in passing and then go out to see your friends.

What confuses me even more than people wanting to have a floor with only their ethnicity on it is the school's condoning this. Upon entering this school, we get so much politically correct, multicultural diversity jargon thrown at us that I fully expected this to be the most diverse place on Earth. After some time here, I realized that a lot of this is just talk. In our culture right now it is probably impossible for anywhere to be entirely diverse. I still though that UMass was striving to become as diverse as possible. How can they condone a whole floor dedicated to segregation?

What the Hell is it?

Seema Gangatirkar

This summer, as I was waiting for a bus, a woman approached me. She had a stack of Bibles in one hand and a sheaf of papers in the other hand. I politely declined the Bible, but feeling guilty about not accepting a copy of the Good Book, I agreed to take one of the pamphlets.

"You be sure to read that over well," the woman told me, before she scurried off to spread the word.

I read the pamphlet she'd given me. On one side were two verses from the Bible, on the other the address of a downtown church. I don't remember the verses now, but the gist of it read along the lines of: "If you don't convert to Christianity right now, you're going to burn in hell." And this church promised to save my soul if I repented all my sins and became a member. Mind you, it didn't tell me whether I would be going to heaven once I became a member of this church. For all I know, I could convert to Christianity and still go to hell.

Of course this little bit of information freaked me out. I quickly folded up the piece of paper and tossed it into the garbage can — risking my prospects for the afterlife in the process.

So now, I started thinking about what was going to happen to me after I closed my eyes for the last time. As a Hindu, I've always believed I'd be reincarnated. If I was particularly good, maybe I'd come back as a human being again. If I turned out to be an absolutely foul sort of person, I'd probably end up as a cockroach. This was my understanding and it pretty much worked for me.

Now there's this thing called hell. It's a pretty hefty concept, especially to spring on someone as unsuspecting as me.

Since my ideas about this afterlife resort are a bit sketchy, I'm trying to figure out what the hell it is like. It's probably kind of hot down there, whereas I'd think heaven is probably air-conditioned. Or, maybe it'd rain and snow all the time in hell and heaven is warm and sunny, with placid little clouds floating around — perfect for angels strumming their golden harps.

Weather aside, hell could be reliving that one moment in your life you'd most like to forget. Imagine Admiral Stockdale walking around for eternity screaming, "Gridlock!" And of course, you'd have to be perfectly aware of everything that's going on, otherwise it wouldn't be hell. In heaven, I'm guessing that those traumatic moments in your life have probably been erased from your memory. In that case, Gary Hart would never have to remember how he blew his chance to snag the presidential nomination years and years ago.

Hell could also be defined as watching marathons of saccharine-laden family sitcoms like "Full House" or "Family Matters." Think about having to spend the rest of forever with the Olsen twins or Steve Urkel. Not pleasant, huh?

I bet in heaven, you get Direct Television and can watch any of the 3,457,856 channels you want and if you want to watch Bob Saget and friends, well, that's your prerogative. In heaven, you can change the channel.

So depending on what kind of rotten sinner you are, hell is adaptable. You hate the DC's cavatelli supreme, guess what's served for dinner every night in hell? Or maybe you bad-mouthed The New Kids on the Block and you've got to pay for your transgressions by listening to "Hangin' Tough" over and over for perpetuity.

So, at this point, it's a toss-up. If I start going to church today, the chances are I'm still going to hell, because according to my parents, I've pretty much been sinning away 20 years of my life. It's going take a lot of confession to negate all that time I've wasted being evil.

So, lady, thanks for the offer to attend your church. I appreciate your concern for my immortal soul, but I think I'll take my chances with karma.

Letters to the Editor

Securing the University Store

To the editor:

On Friday, Oct. 15, 1996, a group of students assembled at the Campus Center Store at the Whitmore Administration Building to bring a specific incident involving a student of color to our attention and to express their ongoing frustrations about security issues at the University Store.

First, we want to offer our sincere apology to the student who earlier this month was stopped for allegedly shoplifting by the security staff at the University Store. It was determined upon further investigation that this student was not shoplifting. This, unfortunately, is a reoccurrence of similar instances that have happened in the past. Previous attempts to address this type of issue have obviously not been effective.

Second, during our discussion with the group which assembled on Friday, we committed to developing an action plan to respond to their specific concerns. Elizabeth Dale, director of business and facilities services will begin an ongoing dialogue with representatives of the group and the Campus Center Commission to review and revise the security policies at the University Store. Effective immediately, the University Store will cease the use of student security staff. In conjunction with these initiatives, the employees of the Campus Center will discuss ways to create an atmosphere at the University Store which is welcoming and responsive to all its customers.

The management of the University Store, like all professional retailers, must take measures to insure that merchandise is paid for before it leaves the premises. Theft of merchandise becomes an added cost of doing business and results in higher prices for all customers. Over the years the University Store staff has attempted to balance this responsibility for guarding against theft with the University's goals of creating a welcoming environment for all students. We must strive harder to achieve the desired balance between these two objectives.

We want to thank the students who courageously brought these issues to our attention. You have our commitment that we will continue the dialogue begun on Friday and we will take the appropriate action to create an atmosphere where every student feels welcome at the University Store.

Lets all hold hands for peace

To the editor:

It is not the first time and certainly not the last that we will hear and read articles coming from people who have no idea about what they are talking.

Dear Prof. Du Bois,

With all due respect, I am very disappointed that an educated and experienced person as yourself would act in such a irresponsible and unproductive manner. As far as I am concerned, your ignorance and lack of knowledge on what really goes on in Israel is as high as the UMass library. People like you and their mistaken ideas will not contribute, in any way, to achieving what we all strongly desire, PEACE.

Let me try and show a more realistic view of what really went on in that sad and tragic incident in Israel. From the first day the Israeli government changed its leadership, Arafat and his people were looking for an excuse to start a new "Intefada" in order to create an international support for their demands.

The opening of the controversial tunnel was just an excuse for Arafat and his people to start what they wanted to and to fool people like yourself in thinking that they were reacting with violence legitimately. The opening of the tunnel had a purpose of bringing tourists to the area, and by doing that bringing prosperity and acknowledgement to both sides. There was no intention to desecrate the Palestinian holy sites what so ever. But Arafat had to stimulate his people and they converted their anger towards the Israeli troops, who were there to protect the visitors and maintain order.

I agree with you that more Palestinian people were killed in the feud, but this doesn't necessarily mean that the Israelis shot more bullets or that the Palestinians didn't shoot to kill. Let's not forget the fact that the Palestinians were shooting at Israeli soldiers with the guns that were given to them by the Israeli authorities so they could maintain order in their land.

Believe me, this story is sad, and I am sure that every citizen in Israel has a strong desire for peace and quiet in the region. We simply have different opinions on how to get there, period. We need to write about the positive achievements that have already been accomplished, and to do our best to calm things down so all the attention can be given to spending time on negotiations instead of confrontations.

As an example, she mentions Peggy Diggs, who has done a project focusing on making the public aware of women's issues such as domestic abuse by making both bulletin boards and t-shirts examining these issues. Ehrlich also mentions Rebecca Graves as a major influence on her project, who posted photography that deal with women's issues on buses.

Ehrlich plans to take a similar approach to her project. However, according to Ehrlich, her project differs from other public arts projects in the past because she plans to use original artwork as a display of the issues she focuses on. Outstanding Five college women will collaborate in the project, which will ultimately involve the decoration of five college buses with artwork focused on the above theme.

In addition to the main project, a scholarship fund is being set up under the same title as the project. This fund will be available for women in the five college community for similar types of projects.

Ehrlich is now looking for approximately 10 female students who would like to collaborate on creating a bus bulletin board honoring outstanding women. This image will be displayed on two five-college buses throughout the 1997 spring semester.

Interested women will be needed for brainstorming and image making during the months of November and December. In May, an exhibition is planned to be held at the Augusta Savage Gallery on the UMass campus in order to close the project.

If interested, please contact Cheri Ehrlich, 208 Bartlett, UMass, Amherst, 01003, either if you would like to participate or if you have any candidates in mind. Please include in your letter your name, phone number, university, year and a brief statement on why you would be interested in participating in, "Celebrate the Women Who Rise Above."

Young women prepare to take action; Rally to be held on town commons

By Amy Corveleyn
Collegian Correspondent

Students in the Five college area will celebrate National Young Women's Day of Action with a rally on the Amherst Commons tomorrow. The rally will begin at 4 p.m on the Commons and will be followed by a march to Haigis Mall at University of Massachusetts.

Tomorrow's rally will kick off a month of direct action in the community, concerning issues such as date rape, safety on campus and access to safe abortion.

Tina Cincotti, a senior women's studies major at UMass and the coordinator of the rally, said the goal of the rally is to empower students to sign up for these issues.

"Our goal is to do something that would make a difference for more than one day," said Cincotti, who was also involved with last year's activities.

This year marks the fourth National Young Women's Day of Action. Students from across the country bring attention to concerns such as women's reproductive and health rights, domestic violence issues, education and lesbian/sexual rights.

The rally occurs in October to commemorate the death of Rose Jimenez, the first known woman to die of an illegal abortion in the United States. After the passage of the Hyde Amendment, a near ban on abortion coverage for low income women, Jimenez became one of many women unable to pay for safe abortions.

At the time of her death in 1977, Jimenez had a scholarship check in her pocket for $700. She refused to lose her chance at an education by using the check for a safe abortion.

The national event is a product of a "Fight for Abortion Rights and Reproductive Freedom" conference held at Hampshire College in April 1992. At the conference, the desire to empower women surrounding health issues was voiced and a network of activists was established. Through a coalition of organizations such as the U.S. Student Association and the Boston Women's Action Coalition, the event was born.

Last year, 350 colleges and universities nationwide took part in the day of action. In the Five College area, students have been involved in the National Young Women's Day of Action for the last four years. However, last year was the first time in which students at UMass became involved.

This year's rally includes four speakers who will focus on four issues. These issues include: date rape and safety on campuses, poverty and the connection within it to domestic violence, the disempowerment of young women and safe abortion access and clinic violence.

Students participating in the rally will have an opportunity to sign up to make a difference in these areas of their community. Following the rally, a month of service will be a part of the five college work in this area.

For more information on the day of action or the community service planned for the month ahead, please call the Civil Liberties and Public Policy Program at Hampshire College at 582-5645.

National Women's Day of Action

By Heather Moreland
Collegian Correspondent

Oct. 24, marks the National Young Women's Day of Action, a day organized for women to speak out about issues that affect their lives and to bring together an awareness in the community and unite the grassroots campaign nationally. The Young Women's Bill of Rights was created in conjunction with National Young Women's Day of Action. The bill was created in the months following "The Fight for Abortion Rights and Reproductive Freedom Conference" for activists across the country.

The Young Women's Bill of Rights is a statement by young women who are uniting and creating a plan of action. The bill addresses issues that are absolutely necessary, entirely attainable and have the capability to empower young women to make positive and social change. The National Young Women's Day of Action promotes women to discuss specific issues and add to the Young Women's Bill of Rights.

Young women expressed the need to create and begin their own pro-active platform. The idea for this bill was based on a Bill of Rights that was presented at the Beijing Women's Conference. The bill is a work in progress. The campaign presented on the Young Women's Day of Action uses the Bill of Rights to open up communication lines between community and campus organizations.

The National Young Women's Bill of Rights is a tool used for young women, activists and organizers to come together and address the full range of issues that affect women's lives. Women are uniting on National Young Women's Day of Action to prove that by working together, these demands are realized.

Upon completion, the bill hopes to address such issues as reproductive freedom, economic development, racial justice, sexual freedom, education and a healthy environment and quality health care for all women. These issues arise from basic freedoms which are addressed in the bill to hold specific influence in the daily lives of women. The campaign demands that young women's rights will not be devalued.

Republican women not taken seriously

Alison Crawford

The importance of public opinion is steadily rising, so the strategy is to rely on the next generation of Republicans to bring the GOP to the youth, giving it a face lift. Surprise, part of the plan is to showcase the women in the party as a additional facet to relate to.

In a recent copy of George, the article entitled "Women of the GOP" was a core story. The cutline read "Meet today's young Republicans. They're tough, ideological and female." This could have some merit, women in the Republican party, maybe they are transforming it from the inside.

No, I'm sorry, I was wrong. They are still marginalized, even when they are supposed to be the ones in the spotlight, or on a fashion runway as they were in this article. Even before commenting on what was said by and about these women, the pictures that went along with it must be mentioned.

Four different pictures — in an article about how strong the women's influence in the Republican party is. The captions read "Model Republicans: T.V. commentator Laura Ingraham (pants and jacket by Calvin Klein, shoes by Prada) and speech writer Jennifer Grossman (coat dress by Versace, shoes by Bruno Magli)."

Maybe these women didn't take it as degrading, maybe they have learned to balance their intelligence with their looks. I am not saying that they hold their positions simply because they are pretty. They are good at what they do, but why do they submit to being cast aside as "Newt Gingrich media coordinator Leigh Ann Pusey (suit and shoes by Chanel, bag by Ferragamo)?"

The Republican party has brought women to the front of their campaign, but, according to the article in George, none of them seem to have an original idea in their head. These women all seem to nod their heads and say "Yes, Bob, anything you say, Bob."

The Republican party is widely considered to be anti- female, as exemplified in their stand on abortion, affirmative action, and in their backing of Clarence Thomas.

"Not true" said Nancy Mitchell, an economist with Citizens for a Sound Economy. "The Republican party is hostile not to women, but to big government." So then why does the party, and the women that are in it, stand by their anti-feminist beliefs?

Women are being used by their media relations staff to soften the attack ads that are being used in the campaigns. They aren't saying what they think, they are saying what they are told.

"It's not simply an attempt to appeal to female voters by having a woman speak," republican consultant Todd Domke said. "It's meant to take some of the meaness out of it."

The republican party asks, "Want to improve women's economic status?" Leigh Ann Pusey, communications coordinator for Newt Gingrich said that part of their platform is "to strengthen families, slash taxes so mothers can afford to stay home and raise their children if that's what their hearts desire." Good — if that is what their hearts desire, but why should women be the only ones mentioned here? Why couldn't the tax break help fathers stay in the home and take care of their kids?

The article then goes on to claim, for the entire women's platform in the party, that abortion is wrong. Penny Young Nance, of Concerned Women for America, said that women "that have had abortions lived with the guilt that feminism told them to deny."

Now it is no longer that abortion is wrong — but rather the feminists who are at fault and are responsible for the guilt that women who have had abortions feel. My understanding is that feminists are working to keep abortion safe, legal and trying to make it affordable.

Kate O'Beirne said that Republican women "reject the construct of feminist movement, which is victimology." If it weren't for feminism and the women who fought to get them the vote, I doubt that Leigh Ann would be coordinating Gingrich's clothes let alone his media appearance.

"Celebrate the Women Who Rise Above" is a public art project being planned for the spring semester. It's aimed to bring attention to outstanding women in the Five college community.

Cheri Ehrlich, a senior art and women's studies major at the University of Massachusetts, is planning her interdisciplinary senior honors thesis in an attempt to bring attention to accomplished women in the area. Sponsored by the University's honors department, this year long project focuses on Five college women who have "excelled in their areas of interest," — academics, sports, volunteer or charity work, student organization, activism or other.

Ehrlich said the project was influenced in part from the works of contemporary women artists who have done similar multimedia projects.

Lee jeans to sponsor denim day

By Michelle Hillman

Lee Jeans is helping to raise funds and awareness by sponsoring National Denim Day. On Friday, Oct. 25. Lee Jeans, in connection with the Susan G. Komen Foundation, the largest breast cancer research foundation in the nation, will take a stand against breast cancer.

The Susan G. Komen Foundation was established in 1982 by Nancy Brinker to honor the memory of her sister who died of breast cancer at the age of 36. The Foundation is supported by a network of volunteers working through local chapters in a race for a cure, according to members of the Foundation.

Lee's National Denim is one of the sponsors and is "underwriting the costs of the whole campaign," said Kim Hyman, of Barkley and Evergreen Advertising Agency. Lee's National Denim funded materials such as participation packets, pink ribbons and flyers that were sent to companies and corporations.

The campaign has involved over 2,000 companies and over 50,000 employees. The program started by sending out letters, advertising in newspapers and magazines and eventually through word of mouth, according to Hyman. The campaign has raised well over $3 million.

Each employee who donates $5 will received a pink ribbon and will be given permission to wear denim to work on Oct. 25, according to Hyman. The funds raised through the campaign will benefit research and education, screenings and treatment for women diagnosed with breast cancer.

On a local level, University of Massachusetts pre-med student Peggy McGowan first read about the National Denim Day in Vogue magazine. McGowan, who is trying to organize people on her floor to donate $5 to the foundation doesn't understand "why more people are not involved."

McGowan was motivated to begin collecting donations after reading statistics such as "every 11 minutes a woman dies of breast cancer," and "one in eight women develop breast cancer."

For more information on how to make a donation contact Peggy McGowan at 546-3240 or send $5 to Susan G. Komen Foundation, P.O Box 703108, Dallas, Texas 75370- 3108.

Taking life one day at a time

Coping with mother's breast cancer changes woman's outlook

Chanel Dubofsky

It's much too easy to overlook, yet much too frightening to face.

For any woman, a routine mammogram is an experience which is not only physically uncomfortable, but emotionally taxing. She may enter the procedure casual and optimistic, but may leave with a dreaded diagnosis-breast cancer.

As macabre and cynical as it sounds, I have become a walking encyclopedia on this subject. Not because I have cancer, but because it has lived with me for most of my life, beginning when I was seven years old.

My mother was diagnosed at age 38, rarely enough, since three quarters of all breast cancer occurs in women over the age of 50. My mother turned 50 only a year ago, and already she has had a lumpectomy, radiation, chemotherapy and a modified mastectomy.

I have been there the whole time. A hundred visits to the doctor with her have made me painfully aware of one thing. I AM AT RISK. Not only because cancer has a history in my family, but because I know too much.

Although I feel that I'm a stronger person because of my experience, there is still a suffocating dread which consumes me at the thought of a mammogram or monthly self examination. According to the American Cancer Society, early detection is vital. It increases one's chances of survival and decreases the chances of reoccurrence.

If you are a woman, you have probably heard this a hundred times. You probably think that it isn't going to happen to you. You're young, invincible, or else too terrified to even fathom that there might be something wrong. I'm not trying to preach to you. I only know that my mother is alive — still continuing to fight, but alive. I have watched her every step of the way.

I understand fear. To find that you have cancer sounds like a death sentence. And to find the lump yourself only throws another spoke in the wheels. I am 18 years old, and only now am I starting to realize that this can happen to me. I am okay today, but what about tomorrow? What about the next day? I have an increased risk, since cancer is in my family. What will I do if I find a lump?

For women ages 20 to 40, a physical breast exam is recommended every three years. I sometimes consider advice as an escape — I'm safe for two more years. But the mirrored truth is this. I am not safe. No woman is.

According to the American Cancer Society, breast cancer will result in the deaths of 44,560 women in America this year. The occurrence of this disease is beginning to increase frighteningly enough, up two percent since 1980. In an attempt to explain these statistics, scientists have offered every possibility — from early menstruation to socioeconomic status. At the risk of sounding narrow- minded, these explanations mean little to me. I am interested in living. Living without cancer, and if necessary, living with it.

I wish you could meet my mother. Perhaps an encounter with a woman who has no hair and endures chemotherapy every six weeks, yet is still able to smile and plan for the future would convince you to have a mammogram. With early detection, a woman has a greater chance of overcoming cancer, so that cancer will not overcome her.

I have lived with the specter of death in my house for 11 years. I have spent afternoons with an IV, nights in a hospital room, mornings in surgery. I am still alive, and so is my mother. I have no guarantees about tomorrow. None of us do. I only know that despite what the future brings, my life goes on, although for some it stops. This disease has given me one thing I will carry in spite of everything — strength. Reluctantly and consciously I know that I must put that in my pocket and move on.

Hoffs falls on comeback album

NEW BOMB TURKS
Scared Straight
Epitath Records

Sick of pop-punk, sick of heavy metal passed off as hardcore, sick of lyrics about being dumped, sick of politics? Then check out The New Bomb Turks. There's nothing complicated about Scared Straight. The New Bomb Turks rock — plain and simple.

Following the lead of labelmates The Voodoo Glow Skulls and The Humpers, The New Bomb Turks remember punk is supposed to be loud, fast, fun and obnoxious. They rip through 12 songs that will make you dance and pogo — standing still while listening to the Turks is not an option.

Playing the same style of rock/punk since their inception in Columbus, Ohio in 1990, The Turks have finally found the production they deserve. After a slew of 7-inches on small labels, Epitath snatched them up and married their raw sound with big time production. The result is the use of organ and horns to push them over the top. Although their sound is reminiscent of the MC5, it also resembles the sound Murphy's Law has tapped into for "Deadicated."

Listening to The New Bomb Turks is like a shot of adrenaline, put it on before you go out this weekend and conquer the world. B (Adam Dlugacz)

SUSANNA HOFFS
Susanna Hoffs
London Recordings

If asked, most pop fans would admit to having The Bangles' first album buried in their collection somewhere. There was a bubbly, confident spark on that first album — a beautiful marriage of bubblegum hooks and New Wave cool. Eventually The Bangles got buried in production gloss and dollar bills, but former vocalist and guitarist Susanna Hoffs has always carried with her the possibility of reigniting that initial spark. Unfortunately, her latest solo effort falls short.

In attempt to present herself as "grown up," Hoffs has recruited most of the L.A. studio crowd (Jim Keltner, Greg Liesz, Jon Brion, etc.) to give the album a sophisticated sheen. Unfortunately, the production choices lack the imagination or passion to give the songs much impact. The first two songs, "Beekeeper's Blues," and "All I Want," are strong enough, but the rest of the album gets bogged down in production and cluttered arrangements.

What the album needs, really, is some of the ringing pop energy that Hoffs is usually associated with. Some jangly guitar and a punchy rhythm section would do her a lot more justice than the moody, heavily layered arrangements. "King of Tragedy," "Grand Adventure" and "Weak With Love" all have great promise, but they get weighed down and flattened by the production. Worse yet are the two "hidden" tracks — mediocre covers of mediocre songs.

What Hoffs needs is a back-to-basics album — an album that puts her wonderful voice up front, and wraps the mostly good songwriting in some snappy pop. Nothing too horrible here, I suppose, but nothing too inspiring either. C+ (Bradley Skaught)

VARIOUS ARTISTS
50th Anniversary Guitar Legends
Pointblank

In 1946, Leo Fender started a small business in Fullerton, Calif. making guitars. Who knew that one day his company would revolutionize the musical world, as his Fender guitar became a trademark sound for such guitar legends as Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton, Dick Dale and Stevie Ray Vaughan.

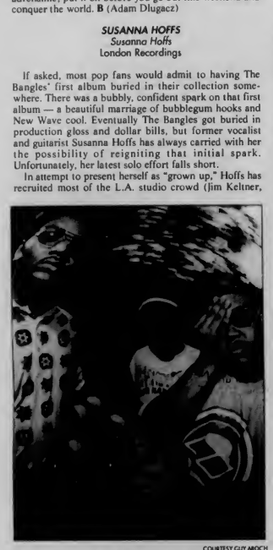
While this album collects some oldies masterpieces (the Beach Boys' "Surfin' U.S.A." and Buddy Holly's "That'll Be the Day") and blues masters (Buddy Guy and Albert Collins) most of the album contains overplayed classic rock hits familiar to even the most casual musical fan.

The Vaughan Brothers star on the excellent "The Telephone Song," which remains one of Stevie Ray's finest moments. Unfortunately this song is sandwhiched in between Dire Straits' "Sultans of Swing" and Clapton's "Let It Rain," two forgettable songs that have found comfortable homes in your local dentist office.

Not surprisingly Bonnie Raitt is the only female contributor and her Grammy winning hit "Something To Talk About" proves her rank as one of the finest guitar slingers of our age.

Hendrix' "Spanish Castle Magic" is another phenomenal track by this much loved guitarist. Even though it was recorded over 25 years ago, Hendrix sounds as fresh as ever.

The album's most recent cut "Come As You Are" by Nirvana hardly resembles the band's best efforts and sounds severely out of place on this album. Side by side with such dinosaurs as Deep Purple and Keith Richards, Kurt Cobain's guitar and whining seems too foreign, too '90s.



Perhaps Nirvana's song, probably not on purpose, reflects the slow death of the guitarist and the guitar solo. Today's popular acts' guitar work strays more towards Elvis Presley than Steve Vai, leading to a decrease in guitar virtuosos. Even still, Leo Fender's contributions will not go unmarked and this album serves as a rocky testament to the genius from California. B+ (Mike Burke)

Theater group prepares for bedtime

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The Not Ready For Bedtime Players are not afraid to talk about sex. In fact, talking about sex is what this group of actors and actresses do best. Safe sex, that is.

"We're basically a theater troupe that teaches safer sex, date rape and other pertinent issues on campus," said Brian Hayes, a third semester Bedtime Player. "HIV, AIDS, STDS — anything that has to do with the health and well-being of college students."

The Not Ready For Bedtime Players came into existence in 1988. Originally a University of Massachusetts theater project called The AIDS Follies, it was the university's response to the AIDS crisis and the lack of information available on campus. Since then, the group has tackled issues surrounded sexuality, including communication and alcohol and drug use.

Though the issues are serious, Not Ready For Bedtime Players manage to convey their messages in a non-offensive and threatening fashion.

"We teach [the issues] through a lot of comedy but there are also a lot of very serious and dramatic skits," Hayes said. The group works out of health education and the players themselves are the creative force behind the educational skits.

JENNIFER ILTIS/COLLEGIAN

The Not Ready For Bedtime Players performed last week at Greenough Residence Hall.

"Most of the [skits] are student written, either by past players or sometimes our graduate manager, but it is primarily students [who] write the scripts," Hayes said.

Fellow Bedtime player Ian Weiss said that the reaction to the shows is very positive.

"They come to the show and they have the best time," Weiss said.

The Not Ready For Bedtime Players will perform tonight in the South Side Room in John Quincy Adams (Southwest). Show begins at 8 p.m. and admission is free. For more information, contact Health Education at 577-5181.

College) have had their hands on some major NHL postseason hardware. Kariya brought home to North Vancouver, B.C. the 1995 Rookie of the Year, and Leetch grabbed the 1994 Conn Smythe (MVP for the Stanley Cup) for his fans in Cheshire, Conn.

But the HE school that has one of the largest representations in the grand old league is Boston University. Over his career, coach Jack Parker has seen the likes of Phoenix's Keith Tkachuk, Chicago's Tony Amonte and Ottawa's Shawn McEachern, and they all have been the reason he has eclipsed the 500 win mark (523-248-40).

This season, Mike Grier and Chris O'Sullivan from last year's BU squad have made spots for themselves on the Edmonton and Calgary rosters, respectively. Grier is looking to take over old friend Mariusz Czerkawski's spot, while any help is good help for Calgary, even if they are 4-4 at the start of the season.

Parker has never been shy to give plaudits to himself for being the coach of such a successful program, and he also was not too shy to give those same plaudits out to his ex-players.

"The reason why we've been successful is because they have played for us," Parker said. "And the reason why we continue to get good players is because they have played for us, and people have seen them play in the NHL, and think that [BU] might be a good place to go.

"So, we're happy for them, although most of those guys we have lost before their senior year. I'm happy for Mike [Grier] and Chris [O'Sullivan] who have made it in the NHL up to this point, both are great players and had great careers for us."

In other words, it does not suck to BU, huh, coach?

KRS-ONE still remains supreme as age brings wisdom to the hip-hop philosopher. His lyrics and delivery just keep hummin' — comin' at you as the chorus rings, "It's the intelligent wise on the microphone," (from "High School Rock").

The title of A Tribe Called Quest's, "Peace, Prosperity and Paper" says it all. This is one of their better efforts so far this year. The Native Tongue's other top prospect, De La Soul, hits their comrades off with competition on "I Can't Call It." They set it for today's narrow viewed crowd — "If you're buggin' out then do what you like/ Self Expression keeps it healthy for self-alright."

The Artifacts drop "The Ultimate" as Tame One and El de Since do all the jersey folks justice for representing the homefront; Sadat X and Brand Nubian EX team up on a chill number, "To the Next Spot;" Pete Rock and the Large Professor rock it with that always fresh production on "In the World." Other rap acts include Scarface with Facemob, E-40, and Little Kim.

R&B was spread neatly in the framework of the album to give it a well rounded personality. KC and Jo-Jo are pleading the ladies, "Won't ya get down. Baby wanna see the wild side of ya, so won't ya get down," while Jodeci hits us on an up-tempo notion. B+ (Chris Maher)

Bengals in chaos as Coslet begins job

By Joe Kay
Associated Press

CINCINNATI — Bruce Coslet begins his second head coaching job with a lot of problems and little room to maneuver.

The Cincinnati Bengals are 1-6, headed for their sixth consecutive losing season. Fans have deserted them. The locker room is divided. The coaching staff is stressed.

It's a much tougher predicament for Coslet, who got to start from scratch with the New York Jets in 1990. Coslet, an offensive coordinator who took over for Dave Shula on Monday, is boxed in by circumstances.

With a home game against Jacksonville only five days away, Coslet had not even spoken to the team as a whole by Tuesday. Players had two days off after returning from a 28-21 loss in San Francisco.

"I've just started the process of telling them what I think needs to be done," Coslet said Tuesday afternoon. "So far, so good. They've been receptive. We'll see how that portrays on the field.

"I'm like the fans out there — I'm a little skeptical right now. And they have a reason to be, and so do I. Nobody's comfortable. It's just a major change and it's going to be a difficult time for the next several weeks."

Players also are showing the strain. Quarterback Jeff Blake, who was with Coslet in New York, walked past reporters trying to get his reaction Monday.

"I'm not talking about the coaching change," Blake said. Other players said there was division in the locker room. "I think that has got to change," offensive lineman Scott Brumfield said. "No matter who's coaching this team, we're never going to win unless everybody pulls together. You definitely have players going their own ways. No matter who's coaching, you're never going to win with factions."

Coslet's job is to fill in the holes in talent and get the players working together, and to do it quickly. Although president Mike Brown talked about Coslet as a long-term coach, he has not given him a contract beyond this season.

"It's almost overwhelming," Coslet said of the team's deficiencies. "It's just one game at a time. We won't fix it all this week. What we miss, we'll pick up the next week, then the next, the next, the next."

Coslet has experienced what it's like to be a head coach, serving four years in New York. He led the Jets to the playoffs in 1991, and was fired after going 8-8 in 1993.

"We have better personnel here than there was at the Jets when I first took over. There's more talent here," Coslet said. "The Jets were in a sad state of affairs, they really were. We went to the playoffs my second year there really doing it with mirrors. Their overall talent level was not good."

In New York, Coslet had a few skirmishes with the media, got into a shouting match with fans at Giants Stadium during a game, and spent a lot of time defending his play-calling.

Coslet said he learned from his first head coaching job and is more qualified the second time around.

"I think I did a pretty good job in New York," Coslet said. "I think I'll do a better job just because of the experience factor. I made a lot of mistakes being kind of a green coach there. Also, I did a lot of good things."

Winners in NBA's free agent war

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

Shaq went West, Michael stayed put, Juwan jumped around and the agents laughed all the way to the bank.

It was an offseason of labor hiccups, bidding wars, trades, signings and — most of all — movement all around the NBA.

Here is a list of the league's top 10 winners in the summer of 1996:

WINNERS

1. Shaquille O'Neal. Signed a $120 million deal, the richest contract in pro sports history, and got to go to the city of his choosing. He'll always be criticized, but he went where he wanted and made a lot of money.

2. Alonzo Mourning. Was a bust in the 3-0 playoff loss to theChicago Bulls, but it didn't hurt him one bit once he entered the open market. Miami had to pay $112 million to keep him around for seven more years.

3. David Falk. NBA superagent made general managers camp out in a hotel when free agent bidding opened, and his high-profile clients — Michael Jordan, Mourning, Juwan Howard, et al. — got enormous contracts. Falk's clients signed deals worth more than $200 million, and he gets four percent of that.

4. Washington Bullets. Thought they had lost Howard, so they used his cap money to get Rod Strickland and Harvey Grant. Then they got Howard back after the league voided his deal with Miami — and the league let them keep the players they signed with Howard's cap money.

5. Dennis Rodman. The player who nobody would touch two years ago is now overexposed. Two new books, a movie, lingerie commercials and his own show on MTV are just a few of his off-court projects. Oh, and he signed a one-year, $9 million contract to return to the Bulls, too.

6. Jordan. Signed a one-year contract for $30 million,setting himself up for a one-year, $36 million deal after that, a $45 million, one-year deal after that, and so on until he's had enough.

7. Jim McIlvaine. Averaged 2.1 points and 2.5 rebounds in two seasons as a Bullets backup, then got a mind-boggling seven-year,$33 million deal with Seattle, a contract that 7-foot-1 stiffs will be negotiating off of for years.

8. Jeffrey Kessler. Attorney in an agent-led revolt against the proposed collective bargaining agreement. His last-minute maneuverings for the NBA players' association drew an extra $50 million out of David Stern's vault.

9. Jerry Reinsdorf. Bulls GM signed Jordan, Rodman and coach Phil Jackson — all for about $40 million. Some other teams spent more than that on one mediocre player. Very shrewd maneuver by a very successful operator.

10. Charlotte Hornets. At this time last year, they decided they didn't want to pay Mourning $100 million. After last season, they decided they didn't want to pay

Women's tennis destroys PC, 7-0

By Michael J. Nam
Collegian Staff

Following a two game skid, the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team ended the season strong with a win against Providence College, their second in a row. The Minutewomen defeated the Friars 7-0, ending team play with a 5-2 record.

"We were extremely well prepared for this match," coach Judy Dixon said.

The match was a continuation of a postponement last week, so the women had to wait before yesterday's opportunity to remain well above .500.

"It was a rained out match, so we carried our practices from the point in which we left off last week," coach Dixon said.

The women won the doubles point, and swept the singles matches for the lopsided victory. The team had looked to win, and win in a strong fashion.

"They were disappointed with their play in the Amherst and Dartmouth matches. The team is looking for a national ranking, and this was a solid win for us," said Dixon.

The tone was set by the junior co-captain Caroline Steele with her strong singles set victory.

"Caroline determined the match. She was fierce, and the fierceness is what has been lacking lately," Dixon said.

Steele herself was in good spirits after the mach, cheering her teammates in the final matches in a game already decided.

"We were killing them," Steele said of the victory.

Ola Gerasimova herself displayed the fierceness mentioned by Dixon when she played while ill.

"Ola is sick and she still went out to play one set. She showed a lot of team spirit when she gave us that one more set," Dixon said.

Gerasimova, only a freshman, played the set and was promptly rushed to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for precaution.

The rest of the team followed the examples given by Steele and Gerasimova, all of them winning their singles matches, including junior Maria Christine Caron.

"Maria played real well at No. 2 singles. She has a lot of talent and gave us a great game," Dixon said.

The win gave the Minutewomen their second victory in a row over the Friars. UMass, in the first two years of the Dixon program, lost to Providence both times, but since then they have dominated them with a 6-1 victory last year and the recent 7-0 win.

"The reason this was such a good win for us is that Providence beat us 7-0 nothing my first year here. They have always been among the better teams in the East, and a victory like this is great for the program."

The women defeated Providence last year 6-1 and have now evened their record against the Friars in the last four years.

The Fall season ends for the Minutewomen with an impressive 5-2 record. If the women finish the year above .500, coach Dixon will have led the team to five consecutive seasons with a non-losing record.

The UMass program under Dixon currently is 43-21 in four-and-a-half seasons in existence, and coach Dixon's career mark is an impressive 83-35 (.703).

Though the season is over for team play, women's tennis continues over the weekend October 25-27, with the Army Tournament at West Point, New York.

For the last tournament of the year, the women will also participate in the Rolex Championships, another individual tournament that will be taking place on November 7-10 at Williamsburg, Va.

Whales out of gate fast HE alums rock the NHL

A lot of surprising, and not so surprising developments occurred in the first weeks of the NHL season. So, without further adieu, elbows-up everyone, and lets do some mucking in the corners:

• First things first, from the "call me Ishmael" department, what is up with the Hartford Whalers? The Moby Dick of franchises has rose up to the surface once again, and five games into the season, the Whale is atop the Northeast Division at 4-1: with a 5-2 win over Pittsburgh.

What? Did Paul Coffey actually sign on with the forever below-.500's, and has he been making a positive defensive influence? Have I been, unbeknownst to myself, sucked up in a tornado, and am now in the Emerald, Blue and White City of OZ?

Keep repeating with me: "We're not in Kansas anymore... we're not in Kansas anymore... we're not in Kansas anymore." All preseason picks are in chaos, chaos, chaos. The Booty Schwag Award has been a curse, and NHL ruffian Luke Meredith is now on four-column suspension from any comments or references to the 1996-97 Schwag recipients, the Whalers.

Jorma Kansanen on the NHL

Note: Come Bruins playoff time, Luke, give the Black and Gold the Schwag, OK? — co-columnist Leigh Torbin.

I feel like clicking my heels three times to get out of this nightmare, but on the other hand, no worries, mate. This can not be a real phenomenon, no way. no how and no chance. I am a Keith Primeau fan, who also came over in the Brendan Shanahan trade with Detroit, but sorry, with a defense led by Coffey and former Bruin pin-cushion Glen Wesley (oh, woe that an open net I missed in the 1990 Stanley Cup?) there is no way they can keep this up.

They started out hot last season, and vanished into thin air. I still think Coffey is a temporary defensive apparition, for both the Whalers and the frozen pond.

He will be gone by the end of the season (Philly?), going along the line of current ex-Oilers making career-ending farewell tours in almost every NHL franchise: Jari Kurri (New York Rangers, Los Angeles Kings, Anaheim Mighty Ducks) and the Great One, Wayne Gretzky (Kings, St. Louis Blues, Rangers). But what happens to my Philadelphia pick now for the Stanley Cup? Oh, chaos, chaos, chaos.

• Speaking of Shanahan, he finally picked up his first goal for the Red Wings Monday night in their 3-0 win over Los Angeles.

Finally? It is going to take time for one of the premier forwards in the league to get acclimated to a real lineup; especially with actually having quality players like Sergei Fedorov and Steve Yzerman around. It is true. After mucking around Insurance-land for a while, it is going to take some time for him to actually get used to having some insurance around him. You know, good players around him insuring that he does not have to carry the load by himself... whatever, bad metaphor.

• Speaking of the Northeast Division, and from the "to be or not to be" department, what is up with the Pittsburgh Penguins?

Super Mario has been more like Hamlet, as he has lost the name of action, and been more un-manly than The Man. He is blatantly absent from the league scoring leaders, as no- brainers Joe Sakic (4 goals, 11 assists, 15 points) and Peter Forsberg (4g, 7a, 11pts) of the Colorado Avalanche are the forerunners, along with Teemu Selanne (5g, 6a, 11pts) of the Mighty Ducks.

The Penguins have a dismal 2-5 record so far, but I must emphasize "so far." The fact they lost to the Whalers is statement enough, but also a 8-1 shellacking at the hands of the Rangers is not a glowing endorsement for team unity, either. Yet, you can't think they will keep this kind of historically based, Whaler-esque play up with the depth of their lineup.

• With regards to the upcoming start of the college hockey season, a look at The Collegian Hockey East file shows that a number of HE players over the years have made their marks on the NHL ranks.

Over recent years, the Ducks' Paul Kariya (Maine), and the Rangers' Brian Leetch (Boston

Shula, Mora & George history in the world of NFL

Names and history can mean a lot in the National Football League, but only when the hometown team is winning.

Let a few losses pile up, especially when they weren't supposed to, and they don't mean anything.

Tom Landry learned that lesson, Mike Ditka learned that lesson, Don Shula learned that lesson. A few more people learned that lesson in the last few days.

The first was another Shula, son of the winningest NFL coach of all time, Dave Shula was finally fired from his job as head coach of the Cincinnati Bengals.

Shula was the fastest coach to reach 50 losses, ending with a final record of 19-52, so it wasn't as though anyone was expecting a lot out of him.

The problem was, after a 7-9 finish last year, people were expecting success. And the talent in Cincinnati, while it may not be able to put up Green Bay-esque numbers, should be at least .500.

Added to that was the fact the Bengals needed to sell a certain number of seats to get a new stadium, and Shula's team was doing nothing to convince people to buy.

So after a 1-5 start and blowing a 21-point lead to the 49ers Sunday, Shula was given his walking papers. He was replaced by Bruce Coslet, his offensive coordinator, and former head coach of the New York Jets (from 1990 to 1993).

Coslet was a major factor in the development of pro bowl QB Jeff Blake and he should do a better job with more to work with in Cincy than he did in the big apple.

The other coach to leave his team was Jim Mora, who resigned from the Saints after a 19-7 loss to the Panthers.

Mora's names had been synonymous with wining in New Orleans, as in his 10.5 years there he was the first person to lead the Saints to a winning season and the playoffs.

However, losing seasons since 1992, two 0-5 starts in a row and a horrible loss to the Panthers, left Mora with apparently no choice. He ripped into his team after the loss, saying "we sucked," "we got our ass kicked" and it was an "[expletive] performance."

The next day Mora resigned.

To end the cheery news, Jeff George was finally released yesterday.

George, who was supposed to be the premier player for the Atlanta Falcons, was suspended after a screaming match with head coach June Jones after he was pulled from a game. The match and suspension are the technical reasons for his release, but he was pulled in the first place because he wasn't winning.

And that's what it all boils down to in the NFL.

Chances are though these three names will all be heard from again.

George he picked up on waivers by any team able to afford the remaining $1.9 million salary. If that doesn't happen, he's a free agent. And with the lack of quality quarterbacks out there, a team will ignore all the problems George brings with him in order to get his million-dollar arm.

Shula also should be back in the NFL in short order, though it'll be some years before he gets another head coaching job. His name isn't the only reason he got the job before he was even 40. Shula has a wealth of football knowledge, and after getting more experience as someone's coordinator, he'll be back on his own.

Mora, on the other hand, may be the next Lindy Infante. After obviously burning out from the losses in the Big Easy, he needs some time to himself to relax and regroup.

But Mora is still young and the game is in his blood. He'll come back in a few years when a team needs a defensive coordinator, and should have another head coaching job soon after that.

Another player who's left a couple teams is Irving Fryar, and he seems to love coming back to haunt them. Fryar continually shined against New England after the Pats traded him to Miami, and he had 4 TDs for Philadelphia when they played the Phins Sunday. If the Eagles ever get rid of him, they better make sure it's too someone they don't play often.

Meyers coming through for Minutewomen

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

To succeed at the next level of competition is a source of great anxiety for athletes. For one freshman on the Massachusetts women's volleyball team, success on the collegiate level has become tangible.

One year ago, Jill Meyers was leading the Huntington Beach, Calif. High School volleyball team to a 24-1 record and a number one ranking on USA Today's scholastic volleyball polls. Now she is a starter on a division one college volleyball team, already filling the role of an upperclassman in just her freshman season.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jill Meyers

Other than her experience in high school, Meyers played for the southern Calif. based Power Club team. Along with UMass teammate Kari Hogancamp, Meyers took the team to a third place finish at the Junior Nationals.

"I think college is more like high school [than club]. It's competetive, you have rivals, you play different teams, and you have more of a goal," said Meyers. "You want to get to the A-10 playoffs and the NCAAs, whereas in club you just expect to play the tournaments.

"It's definitely a step up, but it's a step I've been wanting to take. You work hard all throughout club and high school to get here."

Playing a sport at the collegiate level hasn't just been an aspiration for Meyers, it is in her blood. Her uncle, Dave Meyers, played basketball for the NBA's Milwaukee Bucks, and her aunt is Anne Meyers-Drysdale, the Basketball Hall of Fame member and former UCLA standout.

"I played basketball for a couple of years in high school," said Meyers. "I loved it, but volleyball coaches didn't want me playing. The club season and basketball season overlapped, and they didn't want me to miss volleyball practices. I chose volleyball."

This choice has already paid off for the former All- California selection. Just nine weeks into her first college season, she has already received numerous acclamations for her performance. Meyers was named the Most Valuable Player at the UMass/Reebok Volleyball Classic in mid- September. At the tournament, she led the Minutewomen to a 4-0 record with her 34 kills, 39 digs, and 9.5 blocks. The combination of her performance at that event and her sizling .379 hitting percentage earned her the first of two Atlantic 10 Volleyball Rookie of the Week selections.

Since that tournament weekend, Meyers' play has continued to steadily improve through the season. Her current averages of 3.2 kills and 2.5 blocks per game are numbers good enough to be a key contributor to any volleyball program in the country. Her consistency has emerged at an important time for the Minutewomen, who are in need of a boost to fill in for the recently injured junior outside hitter Lesley Nolan.

"I think that everyone on the team has to step up because [Nolan] is such an important player for the team," said Meyers. "I think that I especially need to step up; I have to stop playing so mental. I need to get back into it and accept the challenge. It's something that I've been struggling with this past week [in practice]."

"With Lesley [Nolan] out, it puts one more freshman into the line up," said Coach Bonnie Kenny. "Jill's numbers need to keep progressing. She needs to keep attacking the ball. She'll probably get a few more swings from the outside now.

"People like Kari [Hogancamp] and Jill [Meyers] who have been on the court all season I can't look at like freshmen anymore. They need to improve to the level of upperclassmen, and because they've been playing all season their noticable improvement is stagnating.

"It was a good recruiting year for us. All along I've expected [the freshmen] to come in and be good, hard working kids, and to get better as they go along."

Kenny is quick to recognize where Meyers has come from, and how far she's gone.

"She's done a lot for us in the serving corner," said Kenny. "She's a good athlete and her footwork is very good at the net. She's quick, which helps her a lot at middle blocker.

"It's difficult for her to make adjustments very quickly. She's from an area of the country where volleyball is played very much and at a high level. [The Calif.-based players] have a hard time trusting people on the East Coast who do know a lot about the game."

Whatever adulations come her way in the years to come, Meyers is glad she be earning them at UMass.

"I love UMass. It's pretty!" Said Meyers. "I don't feel like we are real students yet. I'm looking forward to spring, but now I get to play volleyball all the time, which makes me love UMass," she said.

Israelis, Palestinians restart negotiations

JERUSALEM (AP) — Negotiating amid warnings of fresh violence, Israel and the Palestinians edged closer yesterday to agreement on an Israeli troop withdrawal from Hebron, President Clinton's Mideast envoy said.

However, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat said the gaps between the two sides remained "very wide."

Arafat apparently is holding out for a package that includes not only Hebron, but also an Israeli promise to fulfill peace agreements already signed with Israel's previous government, including a further troop pullback in West Bank rural areas. Israeli security forces were on high alert yesterday after receiving warnings about bombings planned by Islamic militants hoping to scuttle the negotiations. Police set up roadblocks in the Tel Aviv area during morning rush hour, causing a miles-long traffic jam.

The army also said it would ban all Palestinians from entering Israel as of yesterday at midnight, tightening travel restrictions on the West Bank and Gaza Strip already in place.

Islamic militants set off four suicide bombs in Israel in the spring that claimed 63 lives and were directly responsible for delaying the Hebron withdrawal, which was to have been completed by March.

Israeli reports said there was also growing concern yesterday that jewish extremists would launch an attack on Palestinians to try to delay or block a Hebron withdrawal.

Teenagers as likely to smoke pot as to drink

WASHINGTON (AP) — Teen-agers are just as likely to be smoking marijuana in an automobile as drinking a beer, according to a new nationwide survey.

Of the 129,560 students in grades 6 through 12 surveyed during the 1995-96 school year by an Atlanta-based anti-drug group, 10.3 percent said they smoke marijuana in a car while only 8.4 percent said they drink beer in an automobile.

"What this means is that marijuana's role in traffic accidents could be much higher than we know," said Doug Hall, executive director of the Atlanta group, PRIDE. "This is a significant new development."

For the overwhelming majority of students, an automobile was not the place to smoke marijuana or drink. Only 6.4 percent said they drink liquor and 8.2 percent said they have wine coolers in a car. Indeed, most students, 74 percent, said they don't smoke marijuana at all. And among those who do, a far greater number admitted to doing so at a friend's house than in a car.

Fifty-four percent of the students said they don't drink beer and 57.1 percent and 61.1 percent, respectively, said they don't consume wine coolers and liquor.

Vigil condemns police brutality in Amherst

By Humphrey brown III and Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

Approximately 50 community members, high school and college students rallied Tuesday night in Amherst Center in recognition of National Police Brutality Day.

The march and candlelight vigil was organized by the Revolutionary Anarchist Youth and the Coalition Against Police Harassment and Violence.

Rally organizer Ruby Bottlerockez said that she hopes to bring awareness to the issue.

"What we're doing is calling for a civilian review board that can review the actions of certain officers, so that they can... have some kind of accountability to the community," said Bottlerockez.

She explained the difficulty victims of police brutality face when they file complaints, since it entails going to the police station — the very body which is being accused of harassment.

Rally organizer, and Amherst resident, Karen Rock cited an example of harassment when she allegedly witnessed Amherst Police handcuff, and continue to rub a neighbor's face into the ground. When she asked why they did this, the officer replied that the victim, a Cambodian teenager, fit the description of someone they were looking for.

According to Rock, when she later implied that the officer singled out the teenager due to his race, he allegedly covered up his badge so that his badge number would not be seen.

The rally began with a moment of silence for victims of police brutality, and proceeded to move slowly to the Police Station. Onlookers watched from windows of restaurants, as protestors carried signs which read, "End Police Brutality."

At the Amherst Police station, the group, dressed in black in memory of victims of police brutality, began to read out loud various stories of police harassment. What began as a murmur and grew to a crescendo of yelling.

"My name was Anthony Baez and I was playing football in front of my house. The ball accidentally hit a police car. My punishment? He strangled me to death," the crowd repeated.

One protestor banged something hard against the ground, imitating the noise of a gun shot. The group proceeded to lay, as though dead, on the concrete ground in front of the police station. A few minutes later, the crowd left the area.

According to Rock, Amherst police had no knowledge of the protest. The officers on duty had no comment.

"Our intent is to get Officer [Michael D.] Sullivan suspended because he seems to be in charge of all the events happening thus far," said Rock.

March organizer Emilia Jones said that the group had worked with town manager, Barry Del Castillo, attempting to hold him personally responsible for recent incidents of harassment.

According to Jones, all Del Castillo has done is issue a statement stating that racial discrimination will not be tolerated. The group is now conducting its own investigation of the police department. It is now asking citizens to document complaints with the coalition and the Graduate Employee Organization at the University of Massachusetts.

Ka'ahumanu speaks on sexuality

Activist talks about her experiences from the 1960s to now

By Jamie Sinsheimer & Richard James
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday night in the Campus Center on the University of Massachusetts campus, author Lani Ka'ahumanu gave a speech on her life and her beliefs.

The speech entitled "Beyond Binary: The Geography of Desire and Assumptions," discussed her life and how it has evolved over the years into the one she leads now.

Ka'ahumanu is an author, poet, and co-editor of the groundbreaking feminist anthology, Bi Any Other Name: Bisexual People Speak Out; as well as a safer sex advocate and health educator. Her work has also appeared in UTNE reader, The Advocate, ANYTHING THAT MOVES: Beyond The Myths of Bisexuality, and LIBIDO.

Actively involved in the civil rights, peace, and feminist movements of the 1960s when she was a full time suburban housewife and the mother of two children, Ka'ahumanu spoke of that era in her speech.

"I had never determined what I wanted, what I needed, what was real for me. I had it all, but, at the same time I was crying... a lot. My husband and my best friend figured it out. 'You need to leave,' he said. 'You've never had a life of your own.' As soon as I heard it I knew he was right."

After leaving her husband, she went back to school and became a full time student, speaking out as a radical lesbian mother and helping to found the Women's Studies Department at San Francisco State University.

"I came out to my children, ex-husband, my mother, other students and to the world. It was 1976," Ka'ahumanu said.

As her speech continued, Ka'ahumanu spoke of the 1970s and the radicalism that she was involved with. In 1980, she shocked the entire gay and lesbian community as well as herself when she fell in love with a man fifteen years younger than her.

"I returned to San Francisco to my lesbian family of friends and came out as bisexual. I was a public lesbian who fell from grace. I became the public enemy and private confessional."

As a very bi-phobic lesbian, Ka'ahumanu said she didn't know what to expect when people found out about her. Feeling abandoned by the larger gay and lesbian community she was not sure what she could do to regain her inner strength. Thinking about empowering words from a lesbian friend of hers, Ka'ahumanu said she was determined not to let the community kick her out of a place she knew she belonged in.

She also spoke of the assumptions of people and how they think about homo and heterosexuality. Stating that "clearly the institution of heterosexism is based on a monosexual framework that positions two mutually exclusive sexual orientations on either side of a fence, protecting one from the other."

This framework is what creates the line that distinctively divides the two ends of the spectrum, she said.

Naming several gay, lesbian, and bisexual writers of the past throughout the majority of her speech, Ka'ahumanu credits a great portion of her activism to their courage. She noted that all the gay and lesbian people in history had been excitedly claimed as "my people."

Claiming that even though she was attracted to men and women, as opposed to only women, her place in the gay and lesbian world was still firm because Ka'ahumanu is fighting for her rights as a bisexual woman just as others are fighting for their rights as gay and lesbians.

SGA looks at student safety when snow closes UMass

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

The safety concerns of commuter students who make unnecessary and potentially dangerous trips to school on days when the University of Massachusetts closes due to snow were addressed last night by the Student Government Association Undergraduate Senate.

"It is an important motion because it will improve upon a system that is already working to accommodate students," said Sen. Bill Ramsey (commuter area).

In the motion, sponsored by Ramsey, the Senate has requested that the administration increase the number of phone lines in order to address the safety concerns of commuter students.

Ramsey points to the dangerous conditions that commuter students encounter on their way to the University.

He said students often make unnecessary trips to campus because the school closing messages are not broadcast frequently enough on the radio and because the phones are constantly busy.

"By passing this motion, the Senate is recognizing the need to look after the safety interests of all of the students," Ramsey said.

The motion received support from many senators, including Sen. Stacey Shackford (Central-at large), who said she supported the motion because the safety concerns addressed were important.

Some senators wanted to delay the vote on the motion on the basis that they needed more information.

Sen. Sean Marien (OH-Field) wanted to delay the vote because of a lack of information. He said that he was concerned with submitting an act to the administration without making specific demands on the number of additional phone lines.

In response, Ramsey said, "I purposely did not put a specific number in the motion because I need to work with the Administration to find out exactly how we will be able to better the system."

He added that by passing the motion, the issue is placed on "the table for discussion [with the administration.]"

In addition, the motion presents the administration with a deadline of Dec. 1.

In other matters, the Senate unanimously passed a motion that would create a committee of art-related organizations to help develop and advocate the arts on campus.

Sen. Stephanie Parenti (OH-at large), the sponsor of the motion, said that the committee will advance issues concerning the arts through the Senate.

"I think that not only is it a good motion, but it is also a good investment for the Senate," said Shackford, who added she believes the Senate in the past has not had a complete picture of the status of arts on campus.

She said, "the arts have been adversely affected the distribution of funds to arts-related RSO's (Registered Student Organizations) and agencies on campus."

The next meeting for the Student Senate will be held next Wednesday, with the location to be announced.

On Oct. 25 and 26 at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium, New World Theater will present the Hittite Empire in The Undersiege Stories.

The Hittite Empire is an ensemble theater group with a core membership of 10 performance artists and educators.

It was founded by Keith Antar Mason, Michael Keith Woods and Ellis Rice out of Los Angeles, Calif. From its conception, the goal of the Hittite Empire has been to bring the ideals and social issues of the black community into the forefront of social thought and give black people, particularly young black men, the opportunity to express their experiences, trials, passions and visions through the medium of theater.

"We are an all black, African-American, indigenous, intergenerational performance art collective," said Mason, the primary writer and director of Undersiege.

From St. Louis to London, the Hittite Empire has performed in venues throughout the world. Some of the pieces they've produced include In My Living Conditions, Shango Walk Through Fire, and Bus Boy Blues.

In The Undersiege Stories, the Hittite Empire takes a look at some of the problems that have affected the lives of not only black men, but the black community as a whole.

"[Undersiege Stories] is an urban shamanistic ritual created to end gang violence, child abuse and domestic violence in the inner cities," said Mason.

Panel talks of Middle East peace despite worry about participants

By Steve Gold
Collegian Correspondent

Tensions still high in Israel, the current situation and future of Palestinians within Israeli–occupied territories was addressed in a panel at the University of Massachusetts, Tuesday night.

UMass professor of linguistics, Hagit Borer and consultant on education on the development of the Middle East, Nubar Hovsepian, each spoke for about 20 minutes in room 124 of Hasbrouck.

The panel was moderated by Amherst College Professor of religion Jamal Elias.

Indicative of a very complex issues, the event itself did not escape controversy, as an Israeli exchange student at UMass challenged the make– up of the panel minutes into the discussion.

"There is a flaw with your panel," he said and went on to comment on the absence of the "mainstream Israeli" viewpoint. He challenged Borer's authority to speak with an Israeli voice after living in the United States for the past 20 years.

Borer responded and said that she had grown up in Israel and spent eighteen years in the Israeli army, but made clear she spoke only for herself.

After some arguing, Director of the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies, Michael Klare stepped out of the audience onto the floor and apologized for the lack of variety in the viewpoints represented.

"It is my fault," Klare said, and explained that it was he who asked the speakers to come. "We will take this into consideration and try harder in the future."

Despite the apology, the quarreling continued until a man in the audience asked the student to define the mainstream Israeli viewpoint. The point was taken without rebuttal and the questions session continued.

Borer spent the remainder of her 20 minute speech explaining the plight of the occupied Palestinians.

Borer said that a continuing problem is Israeli settlements in predominately Palestinian territories. A 40 percent increase in funding for development projects in these areas, used for the construction of bypass roads, has caused tensions, even violence. However, Borer said no new construction has taken place since the new government has taken power.

Borer shifted the focus of the end of her speech to the recent elections and the political process in Israel and why tension is so high.

"They were tense and bitter," she said. "The issue is not whether or not Israel will be a Jewish state. The issue is whether or not Israel will be a fundamentalist state."

Hovsepian, a former professor at Rutgers University and Hunters College, began his speech with a list of definitions of terms we are "bombarded with in politics."

"A peace process is whatever the US supports at any time and this always excludes justice."

Elias added, "the peace process is not a peace process at all; it is an imposition of terms."

Hovsepian pointed out some of the things he said the peace process has produced; continued occupation, Palestinian control over 3 percent of the land, maintained Israeli control over water and their withdrawal from only seven Palestinian towns.

The Palestinians were excited about the elections that were held on Jan. 20, said Hovsepian, Eighty–eight people were elected to positions. This group, however, cannot take part in the proceedings of the Oslo Accord and had to first be approved by the Israeli government.

Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian authority were, by the Oslo Accord, given the role of maintaining stability, said Hovsepian.

"Arafat's function is to administer occupation in areas under his authority," he said.

Hovsepian quoted Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as saying in 1990, that Israel's goal is "maximum autonomy for Palestinians with maximum security for Israel," which Hovsepian called "an oxymoron." Netanyahu's agenda, says Hovsepian, is "demographic security," to preserve the Jewish majority so that Palestinians do not have a voice in border–drawing or immigration policy.

The panel's consensus was that "Israel has won" and now they are in the position of power, not the Palestinians.

Prof: women becoming more active against militarism in Latin America

By Sarah Buckwalter
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — The women of Latin America are becoming more involved in social movements, when faced with military conflict, said Professor June Nash, who spoke at Smith College Tuesday night.

Nash, a professor of anthropology of the City College of New York, gave a speech entitled, "Woman and Militarism in Latin America."

According to Nash, women have for a long time been victimized by the military in Latin America. Rape, kidnapping and prostitution are not uncommon in areas with large military activity, such as in Chiapas, Mexico, where in the last two years, there has been a strong military presence.

Nash conducted research in Chiapas in the spring of 1994. "Women are taking up arms and threatening the masculine stereotypes of the indigenous population."

Tensions mounted in the region when the attorney general of Chiapas went on television in February of 1994, displaying a photograph acquired from the CIA, of a man named Raphael Sebastian Guillen Vincente, which he said was "Marcos," the ideological leader of the Zapatista uprising.

As a result of this, 60,000 troops were deployed into the jungle near Chiapas to search for Marcos.

"This caused much anxiety," Nash said. "You can understand that [anxiety] when you hear planes flying overhead that you can't see."

In response, said Nash, 100,000 people descended into the main square of Mexico City to protest this deployment. They wore masks bearing the same photograph of Vincente, shouting "we are all Marcos."

"We went with Pastors for Peace in order to closer observe the situation in the jungle," Nash said.

"We were refused admittance, but from where we were, we could see houses flying white flags as a sign of neutrality," she added.

Despite the flags, the situation in the jungle was worsening, Nash said. Young men were taken from homes to be trained for the army. Families were separated, crops were ruined, houses taken over in order to lodge troops. Women were forced to wash clothes and make tortillas for the soldiers.

"The effect on the economy has been devastating. Since the invasion, there has been an extreme dip in the financial market," Nash said. "Their tactics are to kill people from hunger, they prevent the planting of crops during [planting] season, then cut off aid.

Despite this, there has been surprisingly little shooting. "Mexico is a real country and prides itself on not being a banana republic," Nash said.

The amount spent on the search for Marcos so far has been 1.67 billion pesos, or about $557 million, said Nash. The 25,000 to 30,000 troops remaining are each paid 50 pesos a day. These figures do not include money for the planes, tanks, arms and ammunition that are pouring into the area everyday. The United States has already loaned $11 billion to its southern neighbor. It is to be paid back in the form of crude oil, she added.

At the 1995 state convention, many women in Chiapas assembled and signed a declaration against the war. As a result, they were harassed and even jailed, said Nash.

Nash, while in Chiapas, had the opportunity to see the women's reactions first–hand.

"When troops came through the village the women would link arms and turn their backs to the tanks in a gesture of defiance," Nash said. "It appeared to be a memory contained in some behavioral practices."

Women have become supporters of opposition parties, said Nash. She explained that in many cases, women are becoming more a part of the Zapatista movement.

Women, Nash said, in many cases challenged the authority of the military.

"That takes a lot of courage, these men are heavily armed, I wouldn't do it."

tions, the ensemble brings the crisis and obstacles of the characters' lives to center stage and confronts them.

The cast of characters include: "Nike Killer," a serial killer who kills other black teenagers for their tennis shoes in order to improve his self esteem, "Professor X," who teaches the madness behind the MTV vision of Afrocentrism and "Reverend Good Reason," who speaks to the spiritual crisis in the community. They are complimented by warrior gods who battle and destroy demons of racism and self–hatred.

Various works of the Hittite Empire have often been accused of being "too real" for some audiences, but this is something that the Empire has become accustomed to hearing.

"If you come to the show to see a Eurocentric play, that's not going to happen," explained Mason during a Hittite Empire discussion that was held yesterday in the Curtain Theater.

Mason says that the main purpose of the Hittite Empire is to help young black men get their message out and show there is an avenue accessible for them to express themselves.

"We have created residencies in which we work with young African–American men (between the ages of 16–25) to help them tell their own stories," Mason said.

The Hittite Empire works hand in hand with black youth in communities across the U.S. The focus is to expose the youth to new ways of sharing their individual struggles and problems with the rest of the nation, other than the more popular medium of expression by urban black youth; rap music.

"We don't vilify rap," explains Mason. "But we say there's another [definition] of the whole traditions that you come from, that you can respect and use as a useful tool of empowerment to tell your story. That's the work of the Hittite Empire."

Colonel God did it?

C. Taylor Conner

I was doomed by the time I reached five never to be the religious type, damned for all eternity by Belushi and Aykroyd.

My mother had taken me that Saturday in 1980 to see The Blues Brothers, a fine family film if you consider Caligula a fine historical piece. The next morning, as always, we went to church.

The service lulled along at its usual sluggish pace — we were Northern black Baptists, after all — until I felt the Spirit overtake me.

Unfortunately, the Spirit arrived in the form of a slew of expletives newly acquired from Elwood and Jake.

All of a sudden, this House of God had been transformed into the set of Quincy Jones' all-black version of The Exorcist. All I lacked was Kool-Aid to spray the mortified parishioners as my head spun in circles.

Needless to say, my little brown butt made acquaintances with my mom's none-too-pleased hand outside of the church, but what may have been the roots of my questioning big religion couldn't be tanned out of me.

I am of the firm belief that there is something out there, and that's not meant in the Mulder/Scully sense. It is impossible in my mind to fathom the self-creation of that very first unit of matter — something had to start the process, something is way bigger than me. Thus, I am not an atheist.

Yet, although my spirituality is deeply founded, I could never commit to one religion, and have to possess the unyielding faith to say, "Yup, this is the one and only." There's just too much uncertainty in me.

Imagine the overwhelming concept of all the supreme deities of all the religions in the world being arrested, taken into custody, and put into a lineup.

You have to identify the right god. Some of them you throw out instantly, some you examine then discard, and some... well, they look like they might be the one, but you're not quite sure.

Hell, it could be all of them or none of them.

It's something like a game of Clue. You play along, thinking you might know which omniscient presence committed the act of human creation, and then — gotcha — it was Col. God in the library of the heavens, not Professor Allah in the study of all that is holy.

And damned if the culprit doesn't change every time you play.

The problem is that, in our geocentrism, a lot of folks actually believe they know or will eventually know the face of that which, or who, made us all. For all we know, we could be one of the lowest rungs on the universal ladder, a trifle amongst galaxies of superior life forms.

For all we know, we could be the collective Latoya Jackson of the successful interplanetary family of brothers and sisters (if gender even exists beyond Earth, that is).

But, hey, we use a whole 15 percent of our brains — we must have the ability to figure out the greatest mystery any and every world will ever know.

–Organized religion isn't a bad thing necessarily. Billions of people need the basic moral and spiritual structure that it provides consistently on a day-to-day basis.

What a boring, yet possibly more peaceful and tolerant, place our planet might be if we didn't conflict in our religious beliefs. However, we'd probably still put in a concerted effort to find other important reasons to disrespect, dehumanize and destroy each other even if there were no supernatural discourse.

It is imperative that we keep our beliefs in perspective. If I choose to believe my left butt cheek is, in fact, God, then dammit, nobody is going to change my mind. But I'm open to discussion on the matter.

If I choose to believe the trash can beside my desk is the Big Kahuna, then so be it. But I'll still listen to what anyone has to say about it.

And if I choose to believe Elwood and Jake Blues are the Mighty Ones, I'll have it out with you, but get ready for some hardcore cussin'.

Oh... to avoid studying

Miranda Purnell

When my professor told me we were having a midterm exam, I thought I must have misheard him. "Excuse me, an exam?" I squawked in disbelief.

"That's right Miranda, an exam." I remember my first feelings were of shock and terror. I, like many other people, have never been a big fan of exams, tests, quizzes, or whatever you want to call them. Asking me to take an exam is kind of like asking me to shave my head. It's something I can't ever visualize myself doing but if the alternative is death or being locked in a small room with Jenny McCarthy, I guess I'll go with the exam every time.

My friends were kind of perturbed by my chronic aversion to exams. They reasoned with me that it was just something that everyone has to go through. "What's the big deal Miranda?" they'd say.

Well the big deal was, and still is, that I have forgotten how to study. Here I am, a junior who hasn't taken an exam since high school, and I have simply no recollection of the concepts of summarizing and revision. Not that I'm sure they were ever shining beacons of clarity and reason with me, but they are even less so now.

So what do I do? I do what any reasonable person in my situation would do. I phone my mum. Sirens start ringing in my ear. I look around for a fire truck but none are in sight. In my somewhat less than perfect state, my imagination begins to run away with me. The sirens I hear are not coming from the phone but rather from inside my head. They are alarm bells ringing, a warning of my upcoming midterm failure. I start to freak out. It's too much. I throw the phone away as though the receiver is burning a hole in my hand, and collapse on my bed, moaning to my roommate about hearing sirens in my head. "Did you dial '9' for an outside line?" she kindly asks.

That problem solved, I [finally?] get through to my mum. She is caring, understanding, sympathetic and sweet, all the things I knew she would be. She is also in Australia, and after reminding me that this call was costing her (ah, the joy of reverse charge calling cards) $1.50 a minute, she told me to just sit down at my desk and wait for it all to come back to me. I thanked her profusely (mums are so great aren't they), put the phone down and went to my desk. I waited. Then I waited some more.

I was getting a little sick of waiting when I suddenly had a brilliant idea. I decided that I should make a list of all the work I had to do for all my classes. It was a bit of a masterpiece, if I do say so myself. I drew it up like a calendar, using different coloured highlighters for every subject. I even used glitter.

When that was done I looked around my room. It was fairly messy, that was nothing new. What was new was that I had this undeniable urge to clean it. So there I was, tearing around the room, folding shirts which had been on the floor for weeks, making my bed for the first time since I moved in, and desperately trying to arrange my unopened library books in Georgian symmetry. Soon enough, my side of the room was looking mighty fine. But it clashed with my roommate's side so I had to tidy her things too. I had particular fun alphabetizing her CD collection. She kind of drew the line however when I offered to iron her fitted sheet.

All this activity had made me kind of sweaty, so I decided it was time to have a shower. I'd taken one less than four hours before, but as you can never be too rich or too clean, (thin is something I will never be so I'd rather not get into that). I whipped my gear off and jumped under the spray. I was standing there, congratulating myself on the excellent job I had done in my room, when I realized I hadn't shaved my legs that day. So, I grabbed my razor and gave them a good once over.

Back in my room, I dried my hair, then I styled it, then I dried it again, because I had hated the style and had to immediately washed it out. Pretty soon I was officially having a bad hair day. I brushed it, braided it, pulled it, teased it, nothing would work. I begged my roommate to cut it for me, but she couldn't. She had lent her scissors to a friend who had an exam coming up and was avoiding studying. Right that very minute her roommate was cutting her hair. "How ridiculous," I thought, "Imagine getting your hair cut to put off doing study."

I was getting bored. I asked my roommate if she felt like moving the furniture around, but she didn't. She didn't want to play Scrabble, Monopoly or Connect Four either. I couldn't even talk her into changing the message on our voice mail. Just as I was leaving the room to go and check my e-mail, my mum phoned back. "Miranda," she said, "have you remembered how to study yet?" I was silent for a minute as I thought about her question. "No Mum," I replied, "but I have remembered how to procrastinate about studying so I'm sure it will come to me soon."

A dying campaign

Bob Dunn

Has anyone seen Bob Dole?

I'm not talking about the wan, defeated, sort of sickly looking character who has been on the campaign trail lately.

I'm talking about the proud, boisterous orator. The one full of fire and brimstone, hell and damnation. The Bob Dole who would stand proudly on the stump, pounding his chest and promising crushing defeat for his enemies.

That Bob Dole.

He doesn't appear anymore. Elvis gets seen around more often than the person even Dole refers to as "The old Bob Dole."

I'm no fan of Dole's, and I certainly don't want him to win, but I didn't want this. I mean, it used to be fun to pick on Dole. Now it just seems cruel. It might still be fun if he had some fight left in him, but he doesn't. Perhaps it's time to leave the poor, dead horse alone.

The campaign just feels over, and with it Dole's last chance at achieving his life–long goal — The Presidency.

No, not every person who wants to be President is going to be, that's obvious. Somehow. I have an easier time seeing Carter, Mondale, Bush and Dukakis getting on with their lives than Dole.

Dole's been preparing for this, his whole professional career. Early on in his campaign, Dole had made remarks to the effect that he should be President because he'd put in the time. A sort of wistfully nostalgic notion; ascending to the Presidency based on hours logged, but a sorrowfully misguided one. Dole has found out far too late, that no one is just going to hand him the crown, that he would actually have to earn it.

He would have had to do it through an organized plan, a multi–issue platform, a strong campaign — you know, the usual. Having some actual ideas may not have hurt either.

Something died inside him during the last debate. By the end, he was addressing his remarks to anyone "who might still be watching." This does not sound like a man with high hopes. It sounds like a man whose campaign is dead.

So, who killed it? Well, Dole himself is the primary culprit, of course. A few low lights in his strategy:

• He put all of his weight behind a tax plan that won't work. The problem with this was, specifically, everyone knew it wouldn't work and Dole could never adequately explain why it would. Some evidence might have been a good idea. A chart, maybe. Some sort of precedent for his plan might not have been completely out of bounds. Simply snarling, "It will work," through clenched teeth doesn't cut it.

• He decided to go after Clinton on foreign campaign contributions, but couldn't make that work either. The problem behind all of that was he couldn't prove any wrong doing and the money trail for the Indonesian contributions is so convoluted, that even Tolkien wouldn't have been able to make sense out of it. The other problem being Dole appeared hypocritical at best, having accepted campaign money from dubious sources himself, including tobacco lobbyists.

• Despite pleas to the contrary, Dole decided to go after character flaws by and large, rather than stick to substantive issues. This strategy was a miserable failure. A close look at the polls would have made this very clear for 'ol Bobby. Even though polls show that a lot of people have doubts about Clinton's trustworthiness, people were still planning on casting their vote for him over Dole. What this says to me is, people don't worry as much about some money under the table, as much as having a place to go to work on Monday morning or being able to send their kids to college.

The other culprit in "The Case of the Confounded Candidate" is the media itself.

Magazines, newspapers and television have been announcing the end of the race for weeks now. Newsweek ran a cover story recently asking, "Is it over?" Apparently they think so, because the following week they neglected to put any actual news on the cover instead opting to run a completely insubstantive fluff piece on John Kennedy's new bride. The Boston Globe even ran a front page story yesterday announcing that many Republicans were planning on voting for Clinton. Not exactly news to rally the troops by in the Dole offices.

I feel kind of like some Braves fans felt at the end of the playoffs. I mean, I want my side to win, but not if it means humiliating the other side.

Who killed Bob Dole's campaign? I guess in some small way we all did, and for my part, I'm actually kind of sorry.

Dead time

Jeremy Hurewitz

Tuesdays and Thursdays — big lecture class number one. I sit in the big lecture hall, among hundreds of other students, as the teacher talks over a microphone, and look around.

To my right, a girl in a long dress is dead asleep.

Ahead to my right, a beefy looking dude had been picking his nose with furtive gestures. The guy on my left is reading a novel, unrelated to the class. People bite their nails and stare into space. I fantasize about women and carve my initials into the desk.

The teacher talks on. He uses words like "processing unit" and "input/output". Chairs squeak, people whisper, pages ruffle. These sounds of white noise seep into my soul and threaten to nullify my existence with their confusion.

Afterwards, it's onto my discussion section. It's in a small building near all the engineering classes and the graduate tower. I don't like this part of campus. The people freak me out. They have elongated necks and bad skin. They shuffle around with a strange sense of urgency.

The discussion section is a joke. Our TA speaks at a level just above a whisper with a thick accent. We ask him to speak louder and he just looks at us funny and continues on at a level that is barely audible. He is extremely thin and ungainly. I get the feeling that if someone farted he would be blown out the window by the slight change in the room's air pressure.

He goes over the exact same thing we did in class. His English is terrible. Everyone looks at each other wondering if we're all thinking the same thing. Some of the crueler people snicker at our unconfident TA The weight of this event's uselessness weighs on me like a daydreaming sumo wrestler. I wish I was driving my car, or getting a haircut, or riding the bus, or chewing gum, or vacuuming my room, or walking uphill in a snowstorm — anything but this enormous waste of time...

Tuesdays and Thursdays, big lecture number two. More grumbling and shuffling as the professor gives long pauses between her pedestrian facts: "Heroin... is bad for you." People get pissed and look at each other.

The worst thing about this class is that despite its enormous size, the professor has a strict attendance requirement. She sends numerous attendance sheets around and wastes time every other class busting people.

I am a senior. I pay a lot of money to come here and I don't need some nerdy professor to have a ball–busting attendance requirement in a class where she'll never know my name, to justify herself with an audience. Maybe if she made the class more interesting we'd actually want to show up. Furthermore her attendance policy has fostered a "her against us" environment rather than one of collective learning that good professors promote.

Some of you may think I'm a slacker and I should just go to class no matter what — there is some truth in that. It's my loss of money when I don't go to class. I try not to skip too much, but I almost want to trick her with petty chicanery to show her that I am not a child, and you can't force me to be here. This is not high school.

When I sit in these classes I begin to think about my major: English. I enjoy my major and my Mondays and Wednesdays are great because I have all English classes. When I sit in these General Education classes, I think of all those hours flushed away, and how I've never read James Joyce, Herman Melville or Gertrude Stein.

The idea behind general education classes is to make students well rounded, but I don't want to be well rounded. I want to be a sharpened point. While it's noble to try to provide a diverse background for students, this is often not the case. Take my experiences as an example.

Education needs to be more flexible. I know that's not easy at a large University like ours, but I think it's possible. Have more responsive counselors with more power to help the students shape their education to their needs. Maybe the University should figure out ways to inject life into stiff, complacent professors with big egos and boring lectures. Until then, I will continue dreading Tuesdays and Thursdays with "data base programming," and exasperatingly trite soundbites like "prozac is an anti–depressant." Maybe she should give some out in her class.

Comfortably Dumb

Evan Young

All people are idiots. In one way or another, we all fail the smart test. Stupidity abounds in our country, and it does not lie solely within our generation. All people of all ages are brainless at one point or another.

The other day, I stopped at a gas station to fill up. I was the only one around at this particular station. When I went inside to pay, the cashier lady, probably 40–something, asked me "Which pump?" I looked outside at my car, sitting there alone, taking up one of the four pumps. I looked back at her and didn't answer. What, did she think I owned the invisible car at pump number nine or something? "Which pump?" she asked again, this time, a little more angrily. I just pointed and said "that one," thinking "the only one with the car, you idiot," Stupid woman.

Episodes like this happen all the time. Stupid people are saying stupid things and promoting their bad ideas all over our country right now. Did you know that America is no longer the big melting pot it used to be? No, it's now a big tossed salad bowl or something. So does this salad have eggs in it, like the kinds at McDonalds? Or bits of cheese? If we are all a big salad now, what kind of dressing do we have? It better not be Thousand Island. I hate Thousand Island.

People who play sports well are paid millions and millions and millions of dollars. There is a performer out there who is named Meat Loaf, after a dinner entree that at its best, is only okay. People buy Alanis Morrisette albums — even worse, other people think she has talent. Radio station DJ's play songs by "No Doubt," even though nobody in their right mind would want to hear these songs.

On our national currency, it says "In God We Trust" when not everyone even believes in God, and the people who do believe in a God, don't believe in the same God, for the same reasons. We force young students to recite a piece of poetry about America every day before their school day begins, and if they do not, their teachers detain them at the end of the day.

Somebody thought it would be a good idea to make Two Days in the Valley, a movie. Movie theaters thought it would be a good idea to have this horribly stupid movie at their theater. Gullible people, like me, went to see it.

People make shows on the television called "Situation Comedies." There hasn't been an entertaining situation comedy on TV in many years, yet people continue to try to make these shows.

In America, every four years we are given a handful of people to choose from, to lead our country. There are 250 million people in our country, but we can only pick from less than 20 of them to represent the rest of the 249,999,980 people. The choices this year include an old, partly crippled man and a man who used to smoke pot and sleep with lots of women.

As you see, the stupidity is all around. But a good deal of this idiocy occurs much closer to our homes here on campus and in Amherst.

Our campus has police who ride around on horses. If you ever need to run from one of these mounted policemen, just go into a building. Our campus also has a library that can't hold books on all of its floors due to some sort of architectural error. People in the Southwest living area that live in the larger buildings sometimes yell at other people in the other larger buildings. These other people yell back. Soon everyone is yelling, and for no apparent reason. There is a group called the Cannabis Reform Coalition that tries to say that smoking marijuana is not bad for you. At the same time there is a group who says that eating meat is bad for you.

On our campus, you have to pay money to park everywhere, even though many students pay many thousands of dollars to attend this school already. We are led to believe that it costs an extraordinary amount of money to keep large areas of pavement (called "parking lots") in working condition. Our school has convinced us that it is within their rights to charge us money every semester just to put our cars on top of these paved places.

Why are so many people so full of bad ideas? Why is everyone stupid? I once told somebody about my plans to live down at the shore for a summer. They asked "What, do you mean the shore in Pennsylvania?"

As for me, last night I set my alarm clock for 10:30 p.m. instead of 10:30 a.m., and didn't wake up when I wanted to — Stupid.

How to choose a president

Brad Davidson

After reading super–analytical garbage every day about the campaign, the men, and the issues, I have broken down, and must speak out. Each day when I read the Collegian, some little political wimp, who thinks they're going to change the world in two days, is telling me who to vote for and why their candidate is the savior to our problems. To be frank, I am fed up with condescending, want to be intellectual writers, who have nothing better to do than use the newspaper as a self promotion ad.

Instead of following the normal journalistic approach to politics, I chose to write from a fresh perspective. Everyone knows that our current system of elections is not working. Only 37 percent of able voters actually pull the lever each November. So what do we do?

We launch these mega campaign ads, year after year, begging people to vote. We passed the Motor Voter bill, we subscribe to ideas like "Choose or Loose," and generally support any form or method of voter registration. Does this work?

Maybe we need to take a step or two back and realize that our current system of choosing leaders is outdated. We need to come up with a better way of making these monumental decisions. As always, I have given it some thought and present you with these new ideas for Presidential elections.

"Maybe we need to take a step or two back and realize that our current system of choosing leaders is outdated. We need to come up with a better way of making these monumental decisions."

The Smoke and Grope: This method for Presidential elections is quite simple. What we do is ask everyone that wants to be President to line up next to each other. Once lined up, we ask them how many drugs they've done and how many women they've slept with. Whoever has done the least amount of narcotics and has had the least amount of sex, gets to be our next leader. Unfortunately with this system, Dole would be a shoe–in. (Although this way might seem ridiculous, if you think back, it's basically the same system we used throughout the '80s.)

The Switcheroo Technique: Although the United States claims to be the most advanced country in the world, we have not advanced intelligently, like other countries that have chosen women to be their leaders. With all the equality and equal opportunity in America, I guess it is just a coincidence that every President we've had happened to be a man. Well with my switcheroo technique, that will all change.

The way it works is that we elect the President and Vice– President as we usually do. When the election is over and we know which men are elected, we then switch their roles with their wives. Therefore the wives would be President and Vice–President and the men would be the first and second men of our country. My reasoning is simple; any woman that can put up with these so called "Presidential" men without going crazy are obviously some of the strongest willed people in the world. In my book, that is qualification enough!

Appoint Coach Caliperi: He's already got the smile, the clothes and the haircut, why not just let him be president. Cal would be great. He would bring his "life skills" and his "Refuse to Lose" attitude to the White House. After solving unemployment by personally getting everyone a job by using all his nifty contacts, he would then take on health care. I can read the headline now, President Cal saves health care with his new plan, "Refuse to Get Sick."

Everything would be going as planned, his administration would be one of the highest rated ever. Unfortunately after only three years into his term, Johnny would leave early, because he got a better deal from another country in Europe!

Hopefully someone in Congress will read my article and propose a bill to change our system. Maybe my ideas are not the best, but at least they suggest change to an already weakened system. In the end, it won't really matter, because whatever method we use, and whoever is elected, it won't change the fact that journalists such as myself and millions of others will still complain about it anyway.

Sweet dreams

Eliza Berkowitz

The other day, my psychology professor told the class that having a nightmare is a sign of a sickness waiting to happen. He explained that nightmares usually precede a cold or illness of some sort. If that's true, I'd better get my ass to Health Services, because judging by the bad dream I had last night, I'm getting very, very ill.

The dream started out nicely. I was in Disney World with my sisters, my crazy aunt Thelma and a girl that I recognized as my lab partner from 10th grade science. (Don't you love the way random people always appear in your dreams?) It was a gorgeous day. The sun shone brightly. Birds were chirping and people were singing. We were having tons o' fun. We rode Space Mountain, went on the bumper cars and even rode the log flume. Everyone was happy.

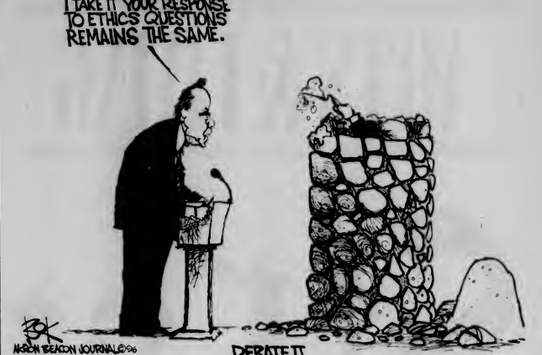
Then suddenly, I was alone. I called for my crazy aunt Thelma, but there was no answer. I screamed for my sisters, but they were gone as well. I searched everywhere for my lab partner from 10th grade science, but I had no luck. It was just me, myself and I.

This part of the dream gets a little fuzzy. I think I got confused and wandered onto the set of Beverly Hills 90210 for a cameo appearance, but I'm not completely sure about that.

After my television stint, I returned to the wonderful world of Disney and again tried to find the people I knew. Suddenly, the sky turned cloudy and, I found myself completely alone, with the exception of the Disney characters. There were no more families, no more tourists. It was just me, Mickey, Minnie, Donald, Goofy, Chip, Dale and a few others. I found it very strange that they weren't in their usual costumes. The heads were the same, but there was something about their lack of limbs that irked me. Where had I seen these tall, plastic bodies before?

An odd feeling of deja vu settled over me and then I figured it out. Pez dispensers! They were life–size Pez dispensers, but contrary to the way I remembered them, they didn't look too happy. I started to back away, but they had already formed a circle around me. I didn't know what to do, so I did what I always do when I'm afraid... I wet my pants. They didn't even blink. As they inched closer and closer, I started to yell.

Help Me!



No luck. These seven foot tall mutant Pez dispensers were determined to have their way with me, but I was going to do my best to flee. So I fled. I ran right into Goofy and knocked him over. I continued to run toward the exit. After what seemed like an eternity, I reached the gate, but it was locked. I turned around and to my absolute horror, there stood the enemy. They looked even more mean than they had before. I could tell that Goofy was pissed. There was nothing I could do. I was trapped. They all raised their little plastic heads and on Mickey's command, they all shot Pez candy at me. Cherry, Grape and Orange flavored candy flew through the air, just missing me. At this point, I didn't think that the nightmare could get any worse, but right then, it did. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw it. I screamed.

No! Not the lemon! Please spare me! I hate lemon Pez!

It was too late. I'd been hit in the side with a piece of lemon flavored Pez candy. I was bleeding everywhere. I finally understood what Ty was talking about in Clueless when she said that before you die; your mind becomes very clear. I fell to the ground and as my head hit the pavement, I woke up.

So, if what my professor was saying is true, I really should go see a doctor. For some reason, I don't think that the people at Health Services will be able to help me. Come on, are the people at Health Services able to help anyone?

All washed up

Michelle Hillman

"Hi, what time do you close tonight?"

"Last wash is at 9:30."

"O.K., thank you."

It was time. Time to venture into the sudsy world of the Laundry Mat. Desperate times call for desperate measures. Everyone has been there, either not being able to get your hands on quarters or just being too damn lazy to wash your clothes. Then it gets down to the fact where you're borrowing socks from your roommate and counting down to the last sacred, clean pair of — well you know.

It's a Sunday night and I've faced the facts. No big deal, do some laundry, a little homework... the usual drift off into space until you realize you're staring blankly at your clothes spinning around and around. This particular night, the realization came to me exactly how complicated laundry night can be.

A few rules of etiquette in the midst of a frantic spin cycle:

1. Never, ever take anyone's clothes out of a washer or dryer before their time has run out. Death will ensue. One time I witnessed an innocent bystander's clothes being removed from an operating dryer. The owner of the clothes walked in the middle of this, and demanded that since her clothes were taken out in the middle of the wash, she should get her money back. After arguing for 15 minutes the guilty person handed her fifty cents.

2. Try to avoid looking at the opposite sex's underwear, especially if you find this person attractive. Flashback — senior year of High School, on a "campus tour" with the padres at an unnamed college. For some reason we went through the laundry room. There was this guy doing his laundry, thinking he was Rico Suave because all the little high school kids are watching him. He pulls out a pair of boxers with a big, huge, raunchy, crusty brown stain — swear to God.

3. Never open the dryer door in front of someone you know. Trying to be cool and making conversation while washing, you decide to act like it is no big deal. All of a sudden the underwear your mom bought you from K–Mart for Christmas, with the built in girdle, goes flying across the floor. It ain't pretty.

4. Always remember to bring your own soap. It sounds like common sense, but you'll be surprised what can happen. One time, not too long ago, I didn't realize I had washed a whole load of clothes with no soap. I didn't really have the money or time to do the whole load over, so I stuck my favorite pair of jeans in someone else's wash. Dirty trick. I figured I'd let them wash for a few minutes until they were clean enough to wear. The washer stops. When is anyone ever on time to get their clothes out? So, thinking my jeans are safe from harm I start toward the washer. All of a sudden the girl comes in for her laundry.

What was I supposed to do? "I'm a freak who put my jeans in with your clothes, can I have them back?" She takes her wet clothes and begins folding them along with my jeans, and disappears. Holy moley. Not knowing what to do, I just sat there — how would I explain this one? She comes back with her wet clothes and more quarters. I ask if she happened to find a pair of jeans in her wash because I was missing a pair and I think I used the same washing machine before her (tiny white lie). I needed these jeans back. She looks at me like I am crazy and ensures me the washer was empty before she put her clothes in (I already know that). Anyway, I insist she look through her clothes, and low and behold, there are my jeans. I don't think she ever figured it out, but I still have the jeans. After a little separation anxiety they were fine.

Let this serve as a lesson. Take caution when in the world of spin cycles, dryer sheets, lint balls and mismatched socks: It's 9:30 — last call — whoops I forgot it's Sunday night.

Letters to the Editor

The other view

To the editor:

In response to Erik Molitor's column, "My Own View," I only have this to say:

I do not support heterosexuality in any way, shape or form. Why do I say this? Because it's immoral — just look at how unrestricted heterosexual activities have overburdened this earth.

Thankfully, this pleasure–seeking lifestyle has not tainted my view of my straight–as–a–ruler friends. But I still can't bring myself to support this hedonistic lifestyle.

Even though I have some great female friends, the thought of having sex with them makes me want to vomit. Yuck.

Furthermore, why do straight people have to hold hands in public, flaunting their perversity? They must be really paranoid about affirming their relationships. I mean, they even need a piece of paper from the government telling them that they're together.

Thankfully, I am a thinking human being and do not actually subscribe to the aforementioned flat–out stupid opinions. Just because you are in the numerical majority, Mr. Molitor, does not mean that your "lifestyle" is the correct or normal one. It is simply different from mine.

It is because of the ignorance of people such as yourself that the suicide rate among gay teens is three times as high as the rate for straight teens. How would you feel if the tables were turned?

And as for being disgusted by same–sex relationships, let me offer you this point to think upon: I am gay and was raised in a "straight" household, and do not think heterosexuality is disgusting. Perhaps that means if you let yourself see same–sex relationships with the same ingredients of love and caring as heterosexual relationships, you would not feel the need to make your "gay friend" a social leper.

Jesse Woodbury
Orchard Hill

To the editor:

As I am sure the rest has been and will continue to be addressed, I would like to address merely the first sentence of Erik Molitor's Oct. 16 column "My own view" and its implication. Molitor begins by informing his readers that Oct. 11 was Coming Out day "for gays, lesbians, and bisexuals." I was wondering if it was also Coming Out day for the author.

If not, was Oct. 14 Columbus Day for Molitor? Does Mr. Molitor have his own personal schedule of sanctioned holidays?

If Oct. 11 is Coming Out day "for gays, lesbians and bisexuals," is not Dec. 25 Christmas for Christians? Maybe I, being a few, should have been going to school on the 25 for the past fifteen years...

The issue Molitor raises in his article is whether or not his opinions as a heterosexual make him homophobic. I would say that his opinions do not make him homophobic, though his practices, such as giving other men hugs that are "brief, and never too close," may qualify him.

However, I would say, Mr. Molitor, that your opinions do make you heterosexist. It is your heterosexism which gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and transgenders alike, as well as many heterosexuals, find offensive and intolerable.

Stressed?

"I'm stressed out."

It's a phrase that gets thrown around a thousand times a day. But what exactly does it mean?

Stress, as defined by the Oxford American Dictionary, is a strain, tension or pressure. Often the most stressful times in a student's life is around the midterm exam period. It's during that time when work begins to pile up and wading through half a semester's work seems like a daunting task. It's enough to stress out the most hardened of students.

Seema Gangatirkar

Dr. Patricia Wisocki, director of clinical training in the psychology department at the University of Massachusetts, said that when an individual is stressed, muscles react by tightening.

"The jaws tighten, hands clench, stomach feels tight," Wisocki said. "Thoughts race and they are often negative and self-deprecatory."

Other symptoms include, a lack of concentration and sleep. Some people lose interest in eating or find themselves overeating. Crying, tuning out and becoming compulsive are other signs of stress.

When stressed, Wisocki said that it was important to get control. For example, getting organized and making schedules are important for keeping cool. Other hints include breaking up studying into smaller chunks so the task doesn't seem as overwhelming.

Clinical psychologist Dr. Carol Beauvais of Northampton said that most of the students she sees come at exam times or when they are writing dissertations.

"These are the common stresses in life," she said.

And while exams are tough, there are students who are dealing with more than just academic stress. Other stresses include alcohol, sex, drugs or the loss of a parent.

"I'm impressed with how much students are handling," Beauvais said.

Up all night

Forget Hammer time, it's stress time — you have a Victorian England history exam tomorrow morning and you still have no idea who Gladstone or Disraeli is, and an entire Dickens' novel needs to be read. You have two choices: stay up all night studying or fail the test and end up living a life like Oliver.

Mike Burke

Big problem, though — pulling an all nighter often is more difficult than that Victorian England test. Usually you need much more than hot pot of coffee to keep you studyin' the night away. Here are some hints:

• A shotgun. This is needed to keep all your friends away. Everytime I pull an all-nighter, my friends drop emotional bombshells on me. The one night you have to study — all your friends will call you about death, dying, depression, drugs or anything else to keep you distracted. And their excuse is always the same — "but Mike, you are staying up all night, why can't you talk to me for the next seven hours? You are my friend, right?" So to prevent this you have two options: take the above mentioned shotgun and shoot them in the yokebox with a tranquilizer. Or you could lie to your friends about your all-nighter schedule.

• Showers. Even if you are one of those hippies who refuse to take showers to honor the fact that Jerry Garcia can no longer lather himself up, try it when you have to stay up. There is nothing more refreshing than a hot shower at 4:30 a.m. to revive you.

• Late night jogs or dips in the campus pond. Running at night in the sub-zero temperatures of the Valley in the winter will keep you awake for hours.

• Coffee. Be careful though, too much coffee will leave you with a nasty caffeine hangover that will ruin your next day.

Turn to NIGHT, page 9

A first for frosh

Tests — I've taken them before. Exams — These are new to me. I didn't understand the difference until I arrived in September to UMass. The major contrast is stress.

Sarah Kimmell

Yeah, I stressed in high school, there were papers and tests, but there also was free time.

It's all in the words you know? "Exam" sounds so much more serious than "test," and "midterm," come on... am I selling away my soul? The terminology is so much more overwhelming. To quote Ty from Clueless, "You guys talk like grown ups."

I also have found that here in my step toward gaining a higher education I have lost hours in the day. I seem to remember there being 24 hours last year; here at Amherst there seems to be some sort of time warp. Now I look on my calendar and see classes, meetings and the ever so important partying. Time management is, in the case of most first semester freshmen, non-existent.

Now midterms are creeping up and the hours seem to be drifting away faster than ever. Each of my professors believes that his class it the most important. Well here's a news flash... I have four other classes that need my undivided attention.

I keep telling myself that I can always boost my grade later in the semester.

Turn to FROSH, page 10

Where to study

As midterms approach, even the most gifted of us may need to crack a book now and then. But what do those of us who have spent the semester so far sitting around alternating our time between reruns of "The Mary Tyler Moore Show" and "I" do?

Jeremy Brothers

Why, study, of course! Easier said than done, however. If you can muster the determination to get your act together by finding those books you spent an extraordinary amount of dough on, then you might realize that studying at home, whether in the dorms or at your apartment, is difficult. Aside from all those creepy wood-grain desks that fill the dorm rooms across campus, distractions seem to come all too easily. Not to mention that staring at your roommates' mug for long periods of time can be nothing but detrimental to your cause.

"I don't get anything done in my dorm room, there's always something going on, someone dropping in to chat — the study lounges are the same way... I get too distracted being around all my friends when there's something important to be done," said Jenna Freder, an undeclared sophomore.

The next logical step might be to find a quiet nook somewhere in the library. There are study floors with excellent lighting for those who find the individual desks too grim. Another option is getting a study carrel for yourself, although it may be too late in the semester to get one. The study carrels are those little rooms littered throughout the library which are always locked. Check with the library's circulation desk or your department to see if all of them have been allocated yet.

Prayers of passing

My grandmother Ma Burke worries about me a lot — she always tell me how I am always in her prayers. Why? She doesn't quite understand the life of a college student.

Mike Burke

In her world, everyone should be in bed by the end of the 11 o'clock news, actually right after the weather. Nights of consecutively staying up past 3 a.m. scare her greatly, so she prays (a lot).

While prayer may be a key to living a stress free life (chanting works too), college students have many other options to keep you from being oppressed by all this stress.

It's actually not that difficult.

Always look at life with the big picture in mind. This helps you realize that one little essay discussing "The Decline of the Non-Academic Intellectual World" means very little overall. I am not advocating a boycotting of your studies to keep up your health, but I get discouraged seeing students literally beat themselves up over grades. Perfection is not necessary, at least not for us history majors.

Don't forget what is truly important in your life. While your academics should not be taken lightly, don't forget your responsibilities to yourself and your friends. Locking yourself in a library carrel may boost your GPA but you may find yourself without a pal to hang out with after finals are over. Then what are you going to do? Buy Carnegie's book on making friends?

Keep yourself in top physical, emotional and spiritual condition. This may sound corny but it is a very true and often ignored, part of

Kilmer's Ghost: a chilling horror, action filled flick

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

THE GHOST AND THE DARKNESS
Directed by Stephen Hopkins with Val Kilmer, Michael Douglas, John Kani
playing at Mt. Farms Theater

How does one accept a horror film as truth in an age when we are taught not to believe in the existance of ghosts and demons?

Stephen Hopkin's new film explores this subject by forcing his audience to acknowledge the thin line between the supernatural and reality. The Ghost and the Darkness combines the genres of both action and horror, creating an intriguing criticism of European colonialism in the late 1800's.

The Ghost and the Darkness is a frightening true story written by Academy Award winner William Goldman (Bonnie and Clyde, Princess Bride). The narrative describes the race of the major European countries to colonize Africa by building a railroad across the continent.

Val Kilmer stars as a British officer named Lt. Col. John Patterson, an engineer commissioned to build a bridge on a river near the small African village of Tsavo. Rejoiced at having this opportunity, he leaves his pregnant wife and rushes with anticipation to the flatlands of Africa, in an attempt to realize his dreams.

The story then takes a dramatic twist when the local villagers begin dying as a result of attacks by a wild predator. No one can seem to catch the monster and Patterson's workers abandon him after over 130 people are killed and the village is destroyed. Patterson becomes obsessed with slaying what he learns to be two lions — or rather what the locals refer to as "the Ghost" and the "Darkness." They are the spirits of the ancient villagers attempting to stop the white men from conquering the land.

With the help of hunter extraordinaire, Remington (Michael Douglas), a Civil War veteran, and a villager named Samuel (John Kani) who is the bridge foreman, Patterson attempts to combat the beasts and the evil they symbolically represent.

Val Kilmer's performance is excellent — he achieves the determination and loyalty needed in order to make the role seem believable. The friendship he forms with Samuel is representative of the cental bond of The Killing Fields.

Douglas' performance, on the other hand, is severly lacking. He plays the part far too similar to Romancing the Stone, and his character is unconvincing as a result. The part calls for sympathy as he is a veteran with a lost soul reduced to traveling the world and hunting game, driven mad since he can no longer cope.

Films with this particular format have always been Hollywood favorites, but severly lack substance and social commentary. To include a prominant flair of drama, and expect a film such as The Ghost and the Darkness to be commercially successful is unreasonable. The public has never been very interested in monster movies which masquerade within questionable historical content.

Despite this, in a period of social concern, where modern day whites are finally beginning to acknowledge the exploitations of their ancestors, The Ghost and the Darkness is a film which should not be missed. B.

Stomp tramples the FAC with energy filled show

STOMP
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
Oct. 22 & 23

When it comes to pure attitude, no one does it better than Stomp.

The internationally acclaimed percussion group stomped into the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Tuesday night and yesterday night for an energetic and creative two hour performance. Even before the show began, the Concert Hall was brimming with excitement.

Attitude was everywhere, from the background music to the set to the performers. The set was built on a metal framework from which everything from pots, pans, signs, fenders, hub caps and garbage cans were strung. The performers were informally dressed in jeans, t-shirts, tank tops or shorts.

The show opened with the most innocuous of props: brooms. During this opening number, no less than four brooms were broken. Replacement brooms were tossed to performers from off-stage.

Other props included dust bins, sand, newspapers and kitchen sinks. The kitchen sinks also involved the use of water.

While Stomp performed without speaking throughout the entire performance, they communicated with the audience through a variety of facial expressions and easy to understand humorous skits. Particularly good at evoking laughter from the crowd were stompers Michael Bove and Danielle Reddick. However, not once did the stompers let a smile crack their lips.

From beginning to end, Stomp was filled with energy. Performing without intermission, the group members managed to maintain a high level of exuberance. The rhythm never let up for a second and the cast was constantly coming up with new and innovative ways of presenting the ordinary rhythms of life.

At the end of the show, Bove led the audience in finger snapping. As Bove backed off the stage, he asked the audience, "How long can you keep it up?" Someone in the audience replied, "How long do you have?"

After the show, the eight cast members gathered on stage for a talk-back session. The session gave audience members an opportunity to take a closer look at the group. The cast members, who range between 22 to 30 years-old, perform six shows a week, with Mondays off. The group rehearses about an hour a day, depending on how much work is needed.

As for the odd assortment of stuff used in the show, Ivan Delaforce gestured to the set and joked, "All that stuff back there, that's real junk."

"We get a high just being on stage," cast member Raymond Poitier said, in response to a question about how fun was it to be a member of Stomp. "No one's ever quit Stomp."

Coralissa Gaines echoed the sentiment when she said, "I love what I do."

And from the reaction Tuesday night, it was obvious that the audience felt the same way about Stomp.

Call and Response celebrates traditions of African diaspora

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

Call and Response: Dance and Music Traditions of the African Diaspora will be presented at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight at 8 p.m.

The performance celebrates the movements, rhythms and cultures of the African diaspora. Included in the show are percussionists, tap dancer, a cappella and capoeria dancers.

Starting off the program will be the percussion group, Dougouto Nganya. Dougouto Nganya is made up of members from all over Africa and parts of North America. Abdoul Doumbia, one of the world's best djembe players, leads the group.

Jimmy Slyde, known as one of the greatest tap dancers in the world, will be among those performing. At age 66, Slyde has choreographed and taught in Paris and Switzerland.

Another highlight of the show will be Capoeira Camara, a Afro-Brazilian dance/martial arts act. Capoeira combines dance, gymnastics, music and self-defense.

Cabildo will perform Afro-Cuban dances, accompanied by native instruments including bata — a set of hour-glass- shaped drums.

The Silver Leaf Singers close out the performance with an a capella jubilee-style African-American gospel music.

Call and Response is funded in part by a grant from the New England Foundation for the Arts.

Tickets for Call and Response are $15, $10 and $5. Five College student tickets are $5 with ID. For more information, contact the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545- 2511 or (800) 999-UMAS.

Surfing for the answers to love & dating

The semester is in full swing, and that means a lot of things — including problems with relationships, whether they are with roommates, housemates, or loved ones.

If you want advice on how to deal with these problems and don't want to tell a friend in fear of gossip, forget about Ann Landers and log on to the World Wide Web.

Believe it or not, there are plenty of Web sites where people provide advice. Granted most of these sites are not run by professionals like Landers, but these sites are faster than any newspaper advice column.

Hassling Heather at www.tiac.net/users/mchgt/hassle.html

If you have a rather common problem, then hassle Heather because she probably has the answer. Her site is dedicated to the common problem of getting the opposite sex to notice you.

Her answers are rather brief — sometimes no longer than one sentence. Users do not have to give Heather their e-mail address nor their real name because the site employs a form which users fill out to tell Heather about their problems. She updates the page about twice a week.

The only drawback to this page is that it is geared more toward the high school scene rather than the college set. However, a lot of the basic advice still applies to these two groups. B–

Damage Control Central at funky.ljx.com/~dc/

If your problems are a little more risque than simply getting someone to notice you, then perhaps you will want to try Damage Control Central.

Nothing is too naughty or nasty for Harriet Cornbluth, the webmaster. The more weird the story, the more she likes it. She will occasionally tread upon subjects more akin to what you can find on Hassling Heather, but she prefers to not waste her time on such questions.

This site is not too practical because the questions are expected to be outrageous rather than common. "We urge you to plunge into your deepest darkest sexual closet, and dig out the skeleton that you know is hiding inside," reads the site's introduction. Unless you are a wild child, do not expect to get any useful advice here. C–

Dear Paula at www.lynxcom.com/pje/guestbook/welcome.html

If you are looking for a forum rather than one individual's advice to your problems, then Paula's site is the ideal location.

Here, the users help Paula dole out the advice. Like Damage Control, nothing is too risque, but the questions are not usually as kinky. Unlike Heather's site, this one is dedicated to mature problems. From what I gathered, the users of this site are college students and young couples.

The site is novel because it operates like a discussion group, so rather than waiting a day or two for a response, they are almost instantaneous. A–

Do not stress over your problem, because the solution may lie somewhere in cyberspace.

Brubeck's classic jazz cools Noho

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

COURTESY SUTTON ARTISTS

Dave Brubeck brings his cool jazz to the Iron Horse tonight.

Tonight, the Pioneer Valley will be graced with the presence of one of the greatest composers and pianists in the world, Dave Brubeck.

Brubeck, 75, has filled his three quarters of a century with writing some of the most famous jazz songs, performing all over the world (and transferring those world experiences to his music) and receiving the Lifetime Achievement Award at the Grammies. Now, he comes to the Iron Horse, that cozy little haven in Northampton, tonight.

Brubeck was born to a cattle rancher and a music teacher in California in 1920. In the '30s, he moved from his hometown of Concord, Calif. to the foothills of the Sierra Nevada, where his father operated a large ranch. This early farm lifestyle became just one of the life experiences that would define this complex musician. In the College of the Pacific in Stockton, Calif., he started with a pre–med major concentrating on being a veterinarian and returning to ranching. However, another love, the love of music, overrode his love of the ranching life and he changed his major to music.

Another experience that would alter anyone was when he served in World War II under General George S. Patton. Luckily, he survived his four years in the service and, once back home in 1946, he would start his life as a professional musician, with a study under French composer Darius Milhaud. Brubeck and friends of his, including Cal Tjader and Paul Desmond, started an octet in the late '40s, with Brubeck's first compositions filling their setlists.

The end of the '40s saw first records by the Dave Brubeck trio, now comprised of Brubeck, Tjader and Ron Crotty on drums. With the addition of saxophonist Desmond in 1951, the Dave Brubeck Quartet was in place and a new harmonic and rhythmic approach to jazz was being born between Brubeck and Desmond. Their sound was defined as "West Coast Cool" jazz, but was much more than that. They toured throughout the '50s with Duke Ellington's orchestra and others on "package tours" and earned a big name for themselves.

Brubeck's Jazz Impressions of... series of the late '50s albums brought forth world rhythms, new modes and keys to play in, with compositions based on countries the quartet, which was going through one of its many line-up changes of the '50s, travelled to.

The explosion happened in 1959. The Quartet comprised of Brubeck, Desmond, Eugene Wright on bass and Springfield native and legendary drummer Joe Morello, came out with the most famous and best–selling jazz album of all time, Time Out. This album taunted with the usual 4/4 tempo, moving away from that rhythm, using times like 5/4 in the famous song, "Take Five" as well as other "odd" meters.

Ever since then, Brubeck has been one of the most famous jazz names on the scene. He's raised four sons, all of whom are professional musicians. He's played with Louis Armstrong and recorded with composer Leonard Bernstein and orchestra. He has done many projects combining music and dance, and made more tours around the world sponsored by the U.S. State Department. He's performed before royalty and clergy, including Pope John Paul II. He's even performed with UMass Music Professor William Hanley.

No doubt, Brubeck will dig deep into his past to give young students a taste of imaginative composition and jazz, international, and classical–influenced piano tonight.

The lineup for tonight besides Brubeck on piano will be also Bobby Militello on saxophone, Jack Six on bass and Randy Jones on drums and, as a special guest, Brubeck's son Chris will be playing trombone.

The Dave Brubeck Quartet will play tonight at the Iron Horse. There are two shows at 7 and 10 p.m. Call the club at 584–0610 for more details.

■ study

For those who find the prospect of burning away the midnight oil in our exalted phallus a tad daunting, there are still other on–campus alternatives. The Lincoln Campus Center offers three excellent options — the Bluewall, the Graduate Lounge and the Reading Room.

Although the Bluewall boasts an impressive selection of coffee and some fine cookies, it tends to be a bit too social for serious scholars.

For those who feel they already spend too much time on campus, downtown Amherst boasts a fine selection of locales to become more lettered. Be warned, however — caffeine is king, and there's no avoiding the barrage of coffeehouses that are springing up around North Pleasant St. — The Blue Moon Café and Starbucks being the newest.

"Despite my instincts to avoid name–brand chain places like Starbucks', they're pretty cheap for the most part and their couches are really comfortable," said Kevin Taylor, a junior STEPC major.

One of the benefits of the five–college system is the access we have to the other libraries in the valley. Along with providing an excellent opportunity to check out just who else lives around here, visiting the other campuses allows you to understand just how big our library is. Remember, there are four colleges, but only one university.

The greatest treat, and one of the most wonderful distractions for stressed students in the valley, can be found in the Amherst College Language Lab on the "B" level. The lab boasts laser–discs at many of their terminals where you can check–out a variety of films from 8 1/2 to Slacker. And you always wondered where all their money went...

■ night

• Food, and lots of it. If you have to stay up all night: eat, eat, eat, eat and eat some more. Hopefully you don't gain weight, otherwise be careful with this advice.

• Stay away from a home study site. Never try pulling an all nighter anywhere near your bed or a comfortable couch because you are guaranteed to take a little nap from which you won't wake up until it's too late.

Freshmen year I tried taking a nap while I pulled an all– nighter for my 8 a.m. Philosophy 100 final. I took the nap at 2 a.m. and woke up at 8:30 a.m. After a quick run down to Mahar I somehow managed to fill an entire blue book with brilliant B.S.

• Never start contemplating your future when you should be studying. I can't tell you how many times I have convinced myself that these little tests mean nothing. Everytime I prepare for midterms, a little voice reminds me that I can always bring my grade up with the final. Sometimes this does work though.

• Take productive study breaks every once in a while. Do some pleasure reading or listen to music but don't visit friends or check your e–mail — you're bound to get distracted and find another emotional bombshell that will be dropped upon your shoulders.

Congratulations if you can pull off an all–nighter — it's not as easy as it sounds. Don't forget though there are ways to avoid even having to pull an all nighter. Prepare ahead. I know this may sound as whacked out as Martin F. Jones' revelations about Gov. Weld, but studying ahead really pays off... at least that's what my professors say.

Mike Burke is a Collegian columnist.

How much students are handling is one thing, how they are handling stress is another. Students sometimes turn to alcohol or sex to escape from their problems.

"Sometimes it will get you through — it doesn't give you an opportunity to correct the situation," Beauvais said.

Wisocki said that certain behaviors such as drinking can be associated with reduction of stress. The effects of alcohol can be just as stressful as the causes.

"Alcohol is a depressant and it can inhibit you from studying and learning," Wisocki said. In addition, drinking with a group of people can be stressful also.

"If they talk about stress, your stress level goes up," Wisocki said.

Another substance to avoid when stressed is caffeine.

"Caffeine is a stimulant," Wisocki said. "It makes your system stressed."

While how your body reacts to caffeine depends on how well you can tolerate it, Wisocki recommends drinking non– caffeinated drinks.

Above all, the best way to deal with stress is to talk to people.

"I believe students have a lot of power available by talking to each other and helping each other. If you see someone who is stressed, don't leave them alone, connect," Beauvais said. "People do a lot better when they make connections."

■ Reimer

earning Yankee Conference and Dan Hansen's National Weekly Football Gazette player of the week honors. But it wasn't until he got the starting job before the 1995 season that Reimer exploded into the spotlight.

Reimer, by season's end, had racked up the unbelievable total of 150 tackles, with two games of 20 or more tackles. To put that in perspective, UMass had only registered three 20-plus tackle games in its history before Reimer came to Amherst. His total led the league, and All-Yankee Conference and All-New England first team accolades came his way after the season. Was Reimer, who had never been a starting linebacker anywhere, from Pop Warner to college, surprised by all the success?

"It was surprising to do as well as I did," Reimer said. "I always had confidence in myself and my abilities. But, yeah, it was a little surprising."

Watching Justin Reimer play football is quite a sight. Often times, football can follow a predictable pattern, where teams march up and down the field with no spontaneous action. That is, except for when UMass is on defense. If you peer in for even just a little bit, you'll see a pattern developing. Just watch the ball, and you'll see Justin Reimer. His 246 tackles in his last 18 games is no coincidence. Reimer plays with a reckless abandon, a reckless abandon that makes him a fan favorite. But Reimer is not one to let his emotions get the best of him.

"I'm not one of those guys who gets super-excited or super-emotional," Reimer said. "My mind goes blank, and I just focus on the game."

Reimer's success has a lot to do with his linebacking mates, Khari Samuel and Mike Dawson.

"It's really great to play with those two guys," Reimer said. "They're my favorite two guys to play with. It makes my job a lot easier, because teams can't run away from one guy."

If there's one guy teams would want to run away from, it's Justin Reimer. He can electrify a crowd with one hit, and he's registered 96 of them so far this season. For a guy who went from being the Minuteman's punter to becoming one of UMass's all-time greats, you could safely say that Justin Reimer has changed his mind about playing linebacker.

bad guy — but they keep making me do it. The Canes have now lost two home games in a row, something that in the 80's just did not happen. Oh, well.

This week Miami heads north to Morgantown to take on West Virginia, and the undefeated Mountaineers can't wait to get their hands on the hapless Hurricanes, who may have to go with true freshman Steve Kelly at quarterback. This may seem like the end for Miami, but 'Canes fans take heart. West Virginia is overrated, and they haven't played anybody yet. The pressure is all on them to win, while Miami, who by their own standards have ruined the season anyway, can sit back and play football. Look for a close game in Morgantown on Saturday, but not a good one.

Booty Schwag Award...

Usually when you drive through Wisconsin, all you smell is the sweet fragrance of cheese, and maybe a cow or two. But this week, all you'll smell is booty! As in the booty schwag and this week's recipient, Wisconsin head coach Barry Alvarez.

Hey, Barry, do you know why you get the booty schwag? I bet you do, skipper. Let's review. You're beating Northwestern 30-27 with 49 seconds left, and you have the ball around midfield. What do you do? What do you do? You put the ball in the hands of a freshman and decide to run the clock out. Was that a wise choice, Barry? No it wasn't. Do you know why, Barry? Because the frosh fumbled, that's why! Northwestern recovered, and a Steve Schnur touchdown pass later, you lose to the Wildcats 34-30.

Oy! I'm vklempt! You see Barry, I told this whole campus that your Badgers deserved a Top 25 ranking in this space last week, and that you might be coaching on Sunday soon. With decisions like that, you might not be coaching on Saturday anymore.

Clowns to the left of me...

Jokers to the right, and here we are, stuck in the middle of a lousy week in college football. When your best bet is the West Virginia–Miami game, you're in trouble. Games such as Fresno St.– UNLV, Rutgers–Temple and New Mexico–SMU pollute the landscape. My game of the week? Our beloved North Texas Eagles are home this week, as the dreaded Nevada Wolfpack come to Denton. North Texas is a five point underdog, but the oddsmakers don't know our resilient Eagles. Quick word of advice, Nevada. Don't step to North Texas, 'cause when you diss North Texas, you diss yourself!

life. Ma Burke always tells me to eat well and she's right. (Unfortunately her idea of a well balanced breakfast consisting of seven eggs, a pound of bacon, a pound of sausage, toast loaded with butter and about six cups of coffee doesn't suit my tastes, she is still on the right track).

Sleep is also a necessity, only pull an all-nighter if you absolutely must. Two hours of sleep a night is far more beneficial than none. I can go three nights in a row with less than three hours of sleep a night. But if I pull one all-nighter I am hurting the rest of the week.

Emotional health is another key that is almost always overlooked. You must feel good about yourself if you expect your body to perform at maximum productivity. Self talk always works. People speak encouraging words to their flowers, why can't you do the same to yourself? But please don't practice this in the reading room. I do not want to hear you recite, "I am a good person. I know I am a good person. Good people do well in school. Therefore I will do well in school."

Finally there is the spiritual health, which as you already know is popular on my grandmother's list. Tests have been proven that people who are prayed for do better on tests than those who are not. This may sound absolutely wacky but it has been well documented. Researchers have experimented on terminally ill patients. For half the group, the researchers passed their names on to random religious organizations to pray for the patients. The other half were left alone. The results were staggering, so... if you really want to stay stress free, pay someone to pray for you. As for me, I am all set — I have Ma Burke.

ter, but let's be realistic, the semester is almost over and with this whole time warp thing going on how is that really feasible? What is a freshman to do?

Upperclassmen waltz around knowing it all. They know what professors want to read, or hear. They know how to study and how to plan their time. I feel like everyone else knows a big secret, they're all whispering behind my back and I'm standing there clueless. I guess there's nothing I can do except experience the challenge myself and then one day I can waltz around knowing it all. Until then I want to rip my hair out, scream at strangers and bite off all my nails.

I asked my upperclassman friend what he suggested I should do. He tells me to just relax, have a beer. Excuse me, what was your GPA last semester? I think my floor wants to kill me half the time and console me the other half. What I want to know is how can I fulfill all of my commitments and still pass Natural Disasters?

After a lot of thinking and schedule reorganization I decided to take the goat path. I cancelled a meeting, cancelled a date and cancelled a beer order. There are plenty of weeks for all those more entertaining activities. For now I'm going to try to buckle down and hit those books that I stood in line for three hours at the Annex to buy.

she always makes the play. She was always steady and reliable. My heart never jumped a beat when a ground ball went to the right side of the field, because she always made the play."

While echoing the same sentiment that the humble Powell is over-looked due to her lack of pizazz but invaluable to the team nonetheless, her soccer coaches are quick to point out her tenacious play in the midfield. Assistant coach Chris Chamides elaborated on her gritty play in a 3-0 loss at rival Connecticut in the NCAAs last year.

"From minute one to minute 90, regardless of the score, regardless that there was, at a certain point, little hope for us, her effort never changed and that why she has so much respect from her peers," he said.

"Everybody knows that she has a way about her and just watches what her way is," Chamides said. "If she's bothered by injury, you'll never know it. If she's bothered by something off the field, you'll never know it, because when she plays she plays. That's how she leads by example and why everybody looks up to her. She gets it done."

What sets Powell apart from just about any other student– athlete on this campus is how people like to talk about her. Between starting for a pair of high-profile sports and being such a model student, one would think there would be plenty to say about Powell.

Still, when asked open-endedly to comment on her, responses made mention first and foremost of her off the field charisma, and the 5-5 Powell's heart, which is bigger than her home state of California. Some responses follow:

• "Amy Powell is the type of person that anyone would love to coach and anyone would love to know," Chamides said. "She is first class in everything she does. She's first class in the way she approaches her academics, the way she approaches her athletics, the way she deals with her teammates and coaches. She is someone that I have the most amount of respect for, and if you bounce this question off of anyone else, you'll get the same answer — she's a special person."

• "Amy Powell is definitely someone you can talk to and she'll make you feel at home," sophomore women's soccer player Amanda Thompson said. "She's such a good person off the field and you can talk to her about anything. So, I felt real comfortable coming in as a freshman last year; I wasn't intimidated by Amy Powell at all.

"She's down to earth, always consistent in what she does. She knows what she wants in life and she works for it."

• "Amy was an absolute pleasure to coach," Sortino said. "She always worked hard and never had a word to say. She was really like a sponge in terms of wanting to learn.

"She's a great human being. You just feel good about being around somebody like her. I wish I had 20 more of those type of people."

• "She's a genuine person and really nice," women's basketball shooting guard Beth Kuzmeski said. "She's quiet but she's quick witted with everything she says."

• "So many people support her, I don't think she has an enemy in the world," Robertson said. "She's such a good person. I never had the opportunity to coach her myself, but just knowing her as a person and as someone who always sticks her smily face by the office [is enough]."

• "She's very personable, reliable, neat, nice, polite and honest as the day is long," head women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "Those are all traits that I find in her generation that are not a sure thing anymore. You don't always find it."

A truly special individual, Powell possesses that special something, irreplaceable after her December graduation.

"She's great and I'm going to miss her after this semester," fellow women's soccer midfielder Julie Magid said. "It will be a little different without her."

Magid will hardly be the only one stung by the inevitable loss of Powell who plans on returning to the West Coast before applying to medical schools for next year.

Nearly everyone who has worked, coached or played on either the UMass softball or women's soccer teams since 1993 will tell you that it has been an experience to relish.

Amy Powell is a major reason why.

COLLEGIAN FILE

Senior Amy Powell is a woman of all seasons starting on two nationally ranked teams, women's soccer and softball.

■ Chagnon

that Chagnon brings to each game and every practice. He is focused on the final three games of his collegiate career.

"We are in a must win situation for our next three games. We have to win," he says with a knowing sense of urgency. "The guys know that for the seniors, it's our last year. They really want to see us go out with an A-10 Championship and a bid to the NCAA tournament. It's still possible for us, but it is a matter of playing to our potential."

Chagnon is one of the guys who is playing to his limits, and possibly even exceeding them.

Gibbons succinctly rated Chagnon as "the type of player who comes to play every game 100 percent. He's played almost all season with injuries, but he is just somehow able to reach inside and find a little extra each game."

That "little extra" translates to the respect of his teammates, who named him co-captain for the 1996 campaign. It also earns praise from his coaches. However, what Chagnon wants more than anything else is to achieve the goals he sets for himself and for the team.

"At the beginning of this season, I had two goals. One of my goals was to run the two mile in under 12 minutes, and finally I did it (11:53)," he said. "The other goal is to make the NCAA tournament."

With that in mind, the Minutemen will take the first step towards that goal Friday, as the Maroon and White challenge St. Bonaventure at Richard F. Garber Field at 3 p.m.

One thing is certain. Dan Chagnon will make sure he can do everything possible to insure that his team goals are met.

He's back. Your housemate's boyfriend. Sitting on your sofa. Sifting through your CDs. Hunching over the open refrigerator. "Say," he says accusingly, "did you guys know you're out of food?" Gee, I wonder why. You like your housemate. You value the friendship. But the boyfriend is beginning to create bad feelings of monolithic proportions. Night after night, he appears. First stop, refrigerator. Second stop, microwave. Sometimes he forgets to check whether the housemate is even home, causing you to believe his affection is based somewhat on the success of the last shopping trip. You think your housemate is beginning to suspect this as well, which is probably why the housemate is not here tonight. Sudden date with the library. The housemate's boyfriend is talking to you again; he wants to know if you can pick up some cheese-in-a-can next time you're at the store. You say, "I hate to be rude, but I'm tired and you need to leave." You wait for protests from the sofa, but there are none. But that's because the boyfriend is not on the sofa. He's drifted over to the TV, filling your once-quiet domicile with sounds from the shopping network. You can't sleep with this on. You wonder what it's gonna take. A natural disaster? A ... wait a minute. Well, sure. You smile. "Say, do you like video games?" Boyfriend nods eagerly. "It's the latest thing," you say. "My friends in Paris play it whenever they want to connect with their friends in Johannesburg. It's great for people who like to travel." You turn toward him and say sweetly, "You like to travel, right?" He nods. You smile again. Type in a few commands. Hand the wireless mouse to him. Then count. Five. Four. Three. Two. One. Oh good, he's chosen FULL ENGAGE mode. Boyfriend's gone. Food's gone, too. Oh well. Into everyone's life a little rain must fall. Which, you think as you catch the mouse in midair, is exactly what it's doing in Paris right now. Damn, that's good software.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

Clean up your act before attempting something new. It will really pay off to be prepared this week. Don't pay any attention to someone who's trying to hurry you along. The little details are especially important.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

This week you have a talent for getting to the heart of the matter, no matter how badly it's been obscured. Be mindful that you don't behave in a cavalier manner. The solution isn't as clear to everyone else as it is to you.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Work around a petty bureaucrat who wants you to ignore the forest and count trees instead. A simple gesture means the world to someone who's been feeling down. Relax and be yourself when the going gets a little tough.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

Focus on concrete tasks early in the week. This will free you from obligations in time to ride the wave of a huge burst of creative energy right before the weekend. Apply it to everything—work, home, even school.

LEO
July 23–August 23

Take charge of a single aspect of your life this week. You'll feel revitalized as you rediscover your interests and talents, plus you'll help others see you in an entirely new and different way.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

If you're looking for a soul mate, consider the person with whom you trust your innermost secrets. If that's not satisfactory, then prepare for a change. Beware a competitor who'd like to steal an idea of yours.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

Listen to an older person for wisdom that will apply to a situation that's unfolding in your personal life. Then, apply it as best you can, no matter how odd it may seem. A friend whom you haven't seen recently has exciting news.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

Watch the flow of money. You could be able to stem a leak and save big—and better yet, you'll look like a hero to someone who has the power to issue a valuable thank-you. Mix business with pleasure to get the best of both worlds.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

Catch up on the paperwork that you've been ignoring lately. Otherwise, you'll be caught empty-handed at a crucial moment. Keep your silence regarding a secret you've recently heard.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

A person who ordinarily seems slightly flaky dishes up some real wisdom for you. Don't be fooled by its silly appearance. Some deep-set anger you've been nursing wells up and threatens to ruin a weekend. Discuss it with a neutral party.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

A disagreement is going to require that you compromise. Be on the lookout from the beginning for things that you can concede on. Remember your dignity—don't lose your cool.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

A conversation with a coworker or partner proves extremely fertile. Be sure to write down all of the ideas you come up with—no matter how far-fetched they seem. They'll be useful in the future.

Good things about MTV

10) Where else can you see a documentary on scrotum piercing?
9) It helps reinforce Kurt Loder's erroneous idea that he's somehow a cool guy.
8) It gives dull-witted, incompetent lemmings who don't have two brain cells to rub together something to do, i.e.: Tabitha Soren (by the way Tabby, news flash: Nobody likes you. Get out of my TV set.)
7) Provides solid evidence that college students are dumber than ever.
6) From time to time, you can see a music video.
5) It provides employment for Jenny McCarthy, whose social status without MTV would certainly never have risen above "spank goddess."
4) If you're lucky, you can see some of your peers make asses of themselves in a "Spring Break Moment."
3) Abundance of sucky programming helps one to appreciate good TV.
2) It has nothing to do with Dole's proposed tax plan.
1) Beavis and Butthead.

The Massachusetts men's tennis team succeeded in becoming the first undefeated men's tennis team in almost thirty years.

By finishing 8-0, the Minutemen are sure to be contenders in the upcoming Rolex Championships during the first week of November. And if you were to speak with coach Judy Dixon, you would get the feeling she knew it all along.

"I was hopeful going into the season this year," Dixon said. "I wanted the team to take their game to the next step, and they have."

The UMass squad knocked off all of their opponents, while sustaining hardly any casualties. The battlefields were strewn with such teams as Boston University, Boston College, Vermont, Rhode Island, and UConn, to name just a few. In the end, UMass has proven to be the ultimate power in New England collegiate men's tennis.

"The schedule this year is the toughest the men have ever seen. For them to beat B.C. and B.U., teams they have never beaten before, has brought them to the next step," Dixon said.

Junior captain Alex Aller led his team with a remarkable 11-2 regular season singles record. He also capped an unmatched 10-3 doubles record, truly making him the team's most valuable player. His only losses came at the West Point Invitational, where he went 4-1 in singles. That record also led the team. But the biggest loss is that he will not be travelling to the Championships.

His guidance, leadership and experience will hopefully go along with sophomore Todd Cheney and freshman Rufino Navarro come clutch time in the Rolex Championships.

"Alex has responded as I expected him to. It was a hard adjustment for him to become the sole leader as a junior, but he really has discovered the sense of team over the individual. Being No. 5 does not bother him because he knows he is helping out the team," Dixon said.

Rob Manchester was another key factor in the success of the team. He tied Aller with an 11-2 singles record but fell just shy with a 7-3 in doubles. Other youngsters who shined above the cement this year were Cheney and Navarro. They combined for 11-9 singles and 13-4 doubles records.

"Cheney and Rufino are the only two going to the Rolex. This tournament can be daunting, at times overwhelming, and this will be a learning experience for both of them," Dixon said.

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN
The men's tennis team concluded the fall season as the first undefeated squad in nearly 30 years.

Cheney will be the lone singles man in the Rolex, while both he and Navarro will combine for the one-two doubles punch.

The question comes up, "Will this powerhouse in men's tennis team be able to prove themselves worthy when it counts?"

We all followed the Chicago Bulls and the Detroit Red Wings last year when they annihilated the rest of their respective leagues during the regular season. The Bulls proved to be superior, but the Red Wings did what they do best, and that is slip on the octopi. So it all comes down to the fact that regular season play is like a tough practice that you have to wear your uniform to.

"They do have the determination to start looking to beat the teams above them. They know they can beat the mediocre teams but now they believe they can beat Cornell, Colgate, St. John's, and West Point," Dixon said.

This UMass team is extremely young with little collegiate experience.

"With my teams, I stress two things. Number one is team first. Number two is that we must be prepared," Dixon said.

If the Minutemen really want that championship enough, they will achieve their goal. One thing we have learned from sports is that it is not always the best team with the best players that finishes victorious, but the team with the most heart and self-belief. Look at the New Jersey Devils in hockey two years ago. They were nothing more than the truck drivers of the NHL, yet through will and determination, they pulled off a league championship by defeating the ever-depressing Detroit Red Wings.

"We have an extremely strict structured schedule. We practice at the same time each day, arrive at the matches an hour early. These kids know what to expect; no surprises here. We've prepared like nobody's business," Dixon said.

All in all, glasses should be raised to the warriors of the UMass racqueteering world. Dixon has been an intricate part of the team and has shown them the light to the spring season.

Alvarez gets the Schwag, Put overtime in the bag

LUKE MEREDITH on College Football

Last weekend's college football action was characterized by one disturbing aspect, an aspect I have tried to ignore so far this season. What, you ask, would annoy me so much?

Overtime!

I was trying to be fair, and the fear of being cast as an old curmudgeon certainly crossed my mind. But after last week's debacle in the desert, something had to be said. And of course, you know I am not scared to say it.

Saturday's Arizona State-USC game was the straw that broke the booty's back. If you remember, ASU and the Trojans were tied at 28 at the end of regulation. In any other year, that would be it. ASU would have a tie to add to their overrated record, and would have dropped to a more reasonable poll ranking.

But no! Thanks to some nit-wit punks in the upper reaches of the NCAA stratosphere, we had to go to overtime. And what a glorious idea this is. You get the ball at your own 25 and can do whatever you want with it, be it kicking a field goal or trying to punch it in. So ASU scores a touchdown, then USC scores a touchdown, then ASU scores again, and then USC fumbles and Arizona State runs it all the way back for another OT TD, and a 48-35 win. Is there any logic to a team winning by 13 points, in overtime?

And furthermore, doesn't this OT format vaguely resemble an MLS shootout? The fact is, nothing should ever resemble anything from MLS.

Okay, Okay, maybe I'm a little upset. I'm sure there are a lot of you out there who don't agree with me. You say, Luke, sweetheart, how much more exciting is overtime than a tie? What do I say to that?

I say, hey, sometimes good football games just aren't as exciting as they should be, and sometimes tradition isn't as exciting as it should be. But the thing about tradition is that it's tradition because it lasts. The question is, will overtime?

Tropical storm heading for W.V.

Even Holden Caufield couldn't catch Butch Davis and the Miami Hurricanes from their meteoric fall. Saturday the last threads of respectability blew away when East Carolina came into the Orange Bowl and left with a 31-6 win. East Carolina is only on the schedule because they're considered a cupcake game, a team the old Hurricanes would have feasted on while waiting for the likes of Notre Dame and Florida State. Now, I'd really like to stop dissing the 'Canes — I mean, I'm not a

Sport star Powell's impact felt off field

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Senior Amy Powell is a dean's list student with a double major of biology and exercise science, but that is not why she is so endearing to nearly every member of the Massachusetts athletic community.

Powell starts for two nationally ranked UMass teams, as a midfielder in soccer and at second base in softball, yet this is not entirely why she is so respected by her peers either.

The somewhat undescribable reason why Powell is as extraordinary a human being as one will ever meet appears nowhere on the resume that she's currently preparing for medical school.

A model student-athlete who excels both on the field and in the classroom, Powell's lasting legacy in the minds of nearly everyone with whom she has come in contact will have nothing to do with acrobatic goals, or home runs, but rather with her impeccable character.

Amy Powell

"There are so many people writing about Dennis Rodman, and that type of famous athlete, but Amy Powell is what it's all about," said Mike Jenkins, assistant athletic director for Student-Athlete Services. "She's an outstanding individual who would still be outstanding if she never played a sport.

"You're blessed to meet certain people in your life that are inspirational in how they do things while not trying to be inspirational. Amy is an outstanding individual who has chosen to showcase her talent on the field in soccer and softball. She's a pleasure as a student, but above all, she is an outstanding person of deep personal values."

It is Powell's values that lead her coaches and teammates to value her so highly in return. Her ever-present smile and authentic, good-humored nature make her equally appreciated amongst those who do not play either softball or soccer alongside her and with those who do.

While playing two completely unrelated sports at a top 25 level is rare, jokingly some familiar faces in the UMass athletic department would like to see her try more.

"I'd take her on my team anytime," assistant field hockey coach Amy Robertson said after letting out a hardy laugh over the thought of Powell wielding a field hockey stick. "There's nothing selfish about Amy and she's a good role player. She knows what her job is and she does it. I'd take her on a field hockey field anytime. She's a great example, well-rounded and a hard worker."

"If there were any more sports on campus she'd probably play them too," women's basketball co-captain Crystal Carroll said. "She's a great person. She'd give you her last dollar. Are there any more of her?"

Powell truly is one of a kind, a rare breed that an exact replica of might not stroll the red and white hallways of Boyden for years to come, if ever.

On the field, Powell is the very model of consistency, not shining out as an All-America candidate in either of her two varsity sports, but a strong player nonetheless, rightfully deserving of a spot in the starting lineup.

Powell patrols second base for coach Elaine Sortino's softball team, which she helped take to three Atlantic 10 titles and a pair of NCAA Tournaments. Always dependable, but never flashy, Powell hit a career high .269 last year with two home runs and 30 RBIs, while literally playing in the shadow of pitching phenom Danielle "Harry" Henderson and others.

"Amy is the kind of player that you just don't notice," Sortino said. "She always kind of does it. She never screws up. One of the greatest things about her playing second base for all these years is that you win because

Punter to powerhouse: UMass' Justin Reimer

Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

Justin Reimer should not be a linebacker.

If you listen to football experts, anybody who doesn't weigh at least 220 or 230 pounds should be playing a skill position, or be the punter. Massachusetts linebacker Justin Reimer is listed in the UMass football media guide at a generous 205 pounds.

Well, you know what they say about assumptions.

Justin Reimer, 1995's Yankee Conference leader in tackles, is at it again. This season Reimer has posted 96 tackles in seven games, and has been named Yankee Conference player of the week twice. As the defensive standout on a team that is now 5-2 and in first place in the YanCon's New England Division, Reimer could be considered UMass' MVP this season. Not bad for a kid who was supposed to be the team's punter.

Recruited by most of the Yankee Conference schools, Reimer chose UMass in 1993, under the premise that he be the team's punter.

"I chose UMass because I liked the coaches," Reimer said. "They were straightforward with me. But I didn't want to be just a punter, that's just not my personality."

Reimer was a star free safety and running back for Wayne Valley High School, earning All-League honors at both positions, and as punter. He scored 16 TD's his senior year, and he also recorded 115 tackles.

Reimer spent his first two years as UMass' starting punter, and enjoyed success at the position. His freshman year he averaged 33.8 yards a punt, and upped that average to 35.9 yards his sophomore year, including a 72 yard boot against New Hampshire, the fifth longest in school history. But his kicking career ended quickly when the coaching staff realized his defensive prowess. Problem was, Reimer wasn't too thrilled about playing linebacker.

"I wasn't too excited [about the prospect of playing linebacker] initially," Reimer said. "It was my second college year and I didn't have any experience at the position."

Nevertheless, the UMass coaching staff, sensing a lack of depth at the position and noticing Reimer's natural ability, put Reimer in a back-up linebacking role his sophomore year, 1994. Reimer showed flashes of brilliance. In his first collegiate start at linebacker, against Rhode Island, he racked up 12 tackles and two sacks,

Chagnon's fire and desire anchors UMass

By Chris Krein
Collegian Staff

If you wanted to follow Massachusetts men's soccer team senior Dan Chagnon in the box score, all you would have to do is look at the opponent's total for the day. His name might not be listed, but often the zero that is there for the opposition after 90 minutes is a testament to his skill and heart.

Chagnon is one of the key reasons UMass has recorded six shutouts this year, as they have rolled to a 8-5-1 record. He is a defensive specialist, who is often called upon to shut down the opponent's top scorer.

The senior from Chicopee has garnered many honors in his career, one that has seen him take all-state honors as a senior at Chicopee Comprehensive and earn A-10 All-Tournament team as a freshman at UMass. Despite all the personal honors though, what he strives for the most is winning as a team. He wants to be one of the people who can take the team to the next level.

"I'm a guy who goes out there and tries to give everything he has. I don't like losing," he said. "In fact, I hate to lose. That's what motivates me. I hope the other guys feed off that."

He came to the Minutemen in 1992 and made an immediate impact, starting 15 of the 20 games he played. "When I got here I saw guys playing with a lot of heart, never quitting, and always working hard," he remembered. "I fed off of that."

Now as Chagnon completes his final year, he wants to be the one that the younger players will look to for inspiration.

"This year I am trying to be a leader on the field," he says.

Assistant Coach Mike Gibbons concurred with that statement.

"He is a leader by example on the field. He inspires people as individuals and as a team," Gibbons explained, then illustrated Chagnon's tenacious style of play.

"He is a very good man marker. He wins almost every 50- 50 ball that it in his area," Gibbons said. "He is an excellent defender who has often marked the most dangerous player on the opponent's team. Every time he shuts them down. He is the type of player you want on your team."

Head Coach Sam Koch agrees with Gibbons when it comes to describing one of his team's greatest defensive assets.

"Dan is a lot like Joe [Jacobson]. He is a solid defender who also shows great leadership on the field," Koch said. "He has been outstanding in that role. There have been a number of games where he has single-handedly stopped breakaways and kept us in that particular game."

Koch points to the recent win over La Salle, a win that was a must for the Minutemen. Chagnon was part of the defensive effort that was able to contain one of the most potent scoring threats in the Atlantic Ten. The Explorers came into the game undefeated in league play and walked off their home pitch with a 3-0 loss.

The win keeps the Minutemen in the thick of the pack with a 5-3-0 conference record, as four teams are racing for two remaining spots in the post-season tournament.

Chagnon said he thinks the game against La Salle may have been a defining moment that will serve as a guide to the direction the team takes for the rest of the season.

"On this year's team, we've got a lot of guys with a lot of talent, a lot of potential, but we don't have a lot of heart at times," he said. "On Sunday [against La Salle] guys battled through and it was the first time, in a long time, that we showed a lot of heart on the field. It was good to see that. We were hungry, we battled, and all the guys came together."

It is a certain and intense approach

Men's lacrosse club pounds Conn. Huskies, women's rugby wins big over Brown 35–0

Sports Briefs

• Saturday, Oct. 19, the Massachusetts Lacrosse Club played host to a tough old rival, the University of Connecticut varsity men's club lacrosse team.

UMass emerged with bragging rights, winning the contest 13–4. The teams felt honored by the presence of two excellent Boston-area Div. I varsity-level officials, both of whom had requested assignment to this game.

In goal for UMass, Mike Nowlan kept those saves coming and shots deflecting, anchoring the defense behind the tireless close defensive play of Greg Smith, Erik Becker, Tom Schauweker, and Micah Mellor. Versatile longstick/shortstick Tim Mooney played on fire everywhere he was needed, on face-offs, and on man-down defense.

At midfield, the mature leadership of Tom Brunette and Brendan Keenan was pivotal amid the heart-and-hustle play of Roberto Torres, Russell Ramm, and Ben Roesch.

The UConn goaltender was a wall, deflecting several UMass shots, but the UMass offense found holes in the UConn defense. Gurmeet Singh, back in action after a knee injury, led the offense with good setups, notching five assist and two goals. Fiery Jeff Olszewski was the other half of the connection, amassing five goals and two assists. Trevor Spiers shot in four goals and set up another two. Greg Resnick and Brunette added to the team total with a goal each.

Following this last game of the fall ball season and waning daylight hours, the UMass club lacrosse team moves inside to Boyden Gym for box lacrosse on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday nights from 9 p.m. to 11 p.m. The first night of play is Nov. 4. The goal is to maintain conditioning and stick skills. New players with some experience are welcome. Call Coach Dietel at 545-3815 for more information.

Women's rugby earns shutout

• In a must win situation, the UMass women's rugby team came out to play and rolled over Brown University 35-0 this past Saturday.

The win kept UMass' post season hopes alive as they needed to win by a large margin to prove their mettle. The barrage of scoring was led by senior fullback Kathleen Irish who chipped in to the winning effort with 15 tries to pace the UMass offense before leaving the game with a knee injury. Irish will be out of action in the coming weeks. Other tries were scored by senior Bridgett Nowd, Claudia Morales and Melanie Roy.

Brown could not muster the win as it couldn't get its offense going. The Bears could only play defense against a UMass squad that ran the ball at will.

Captains Bonneau & Perry; UMass' dynamic duo

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Sports

The good folks in the Massachusetts hockey equipment room have had it easy, compared to other schools, for the past three years. Not once in that time did they have to make any new nameplates, or more importantly stitch a "C" on the front of one of the team's unique sweaters.

After three years of proudly sporting the symbol of the team's captaincy on his left breast, Jaynen Rissling has abdicated his throne, passing his duties on to the collective efforts of Rob Bonneau and Tom Perry.

Co-captains Bonneau (pictured) and Perry become just the second and third captains of the program since its reinstatement for the 1993-94 campaign, and unlike Rissling, the first that will not bear the onus of learning on the job.

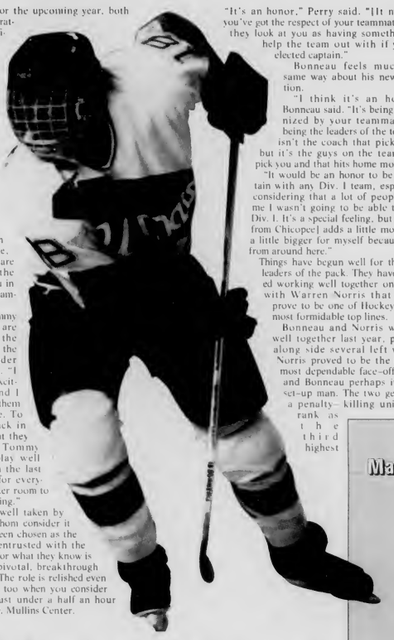
"It's great to finally have a situation where we have real seniors that have been through the program for four years that can show to the freshmen how things are done, what pace they need to have, what kind of strength and endurance they need to have," head coach Joe Mallen said.

When it came time to choose captains for the 1996-97 year, which is expected to be UMass' break through season into Hockey East's upper echelon, the players voted Bonneau and Perry as their leaders.

Bonneau, a native of Chicopee, is a flashy goal scorer and quick skater with good passing skills. Perry is a head-smart and rugged winger with excellent passing skills that are a crucial factor in UMass' four forward power play system, where Bonneau scored 38-percent of his goals last year. The two compliment each other well as linemates, and should continue to do so as co-captains.

"Robbie's a good emotional captain, while Tommy leads with the way he acts and the way he plays speaks for himself," junior Brad Norton said. "[They're] very good captains, great leaders on and off the ice and great guys in the locker room."

If Tom Perry were to send a letter to Dear Abby, the signature might read "Humble in Humboldt," the soft-spoken forward's home-town in rural Saskatchewan. Perry has also earned the respect of his teammates by not missing a beat after hurting his knee is the season-ending playoff loss at Boston University. Perry leads by example, mucking and grinding on the ice and is soft-spoken off of it. Although less soft-spoken than his comrade, Bonneau isn't exactly Don Cherry either, but that's alright.



"Tom and I might not be the most vocal [players] on the team, but we have other guys who are going to do that job," Bonneau said.

As the new season dawns, opening tomorrow night at arch-rival UMass-Lowell, each are excited about the team's prospects for the upcoming year, both reflecting and generating a sense of confidence and enthusiasm that far exceeds levels from the past two preseasons.

This year's edition of the Minutemen, finally graced with experience, feels confident that when Hockey East plays its semifinals at the FleetCenter in Boston on March 14, it will be in uniform and not in a balcony seat. Good leaders on and off the ice, Bonneau and Perry are the ones to take the team to this plateau in the eyes of their teammates.

"Robbie and Tommy are the ones who are going to show us the light at the end of the tunnel," netminder Brian Regan said. "I have been really excited in practice, and I have fun watching them come down on me. To see them come back in the great shape that they are, and to see Tommy come back and play well after the injury in the last game is a reason for everyone else in the locker room to get up and get it going."

That respect is well taken by the duo, both of whom consider it an honor to have been chosen as the co-captains, and entrusted with the team's leadership, for what they know is expected to be a pivotal, breakthrough season for UMass. The role is relished even higher by Bonneau too when you consider that he grew up just under a half an hour from the William D. Mullins Center.

"It's an honor," Perry said. "[It means] you've got the respect of your teammates and they look at you as having something to help the team out with if you're elected captain."

Bonneau feels much the same way about his new position.

"I think it's an honor," Bonneau said. "It's being recognized by your teammates as being the leaders of the team. It isn't the coach that picks you, but it's the guys on the team that pick you and that hits home most.

"It would be an honor to be a captain with any Div. I team, especially considering that a lot of people told me I wasn't going to be able to play Div. I. It's a special feeling, but [being from Chicopee] adds a little more. It's a little bigger for myself because I'm from around here."

Things have begun well for the new leaders of the pack. They have started working well together on a line with Warren Norris that could prove to be one of Hockey East's most formidable top lines.

Bonneau and Norris worked well together last year, playing along side several left wings. Norris proved to be the team's most dependable face-off taker, and Bonneau perhaps its best set-up man. The two gelled as a penalty-killing unit, and rank as the third highest returning scoring tandem in Hockey East, after notching 86 combined points last year.

In that department, Bonneau and Norris trail only BU's Chris Drury and Shawn Bates (117) and New Hampshire's Eric Boguniecki and Mark Mowers (99). The tandem is tied for third with Maine's Dan Shermerhorn and Shawn Wansborough.

The consistent addition of Perry, who will add some muscle on the left side, should both balance and add to the Bonneau-Norris combo, and present problems for UMass foes. Having a line Mallen can truly count on benefits the team in the challenging Hockey East Association. The trio will offer stability to a team that clearly needs it after a pair of rocky first years at the Div. I level.

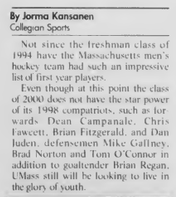
"It's such a tough league," Bonneau said. "There's no gimme games in this league, every game's a tough game."

Facing higher expectations this season against a challenging schedule, Bonneau and Perry will be looked upon to ensure that the team doesn't stray if it hits a rut at some point, keeping it focused on winning, but not too much so.

"I think [the captains] have to put some pressure on ourselves to help anchor this team in the offensive output, but we can't put too much pressure on ourselves because you go into the tank," Perry said.

It is the captains' responsibility to ensure that the team keeps its cool in both good and bad times, and maintains its competitive balance throughout the entire grueling five month season. Knowing this balance comes with experience, something that UMass teams in the past have lacked, and something that Perry and Bonneau have.

Mike Hanieski and his crack assistants in the equipment room just might have to stay up late in March, packing for Boston.



First-year players add depth to UM squad

Rookie class of Blanchard, Sell, Stork and Tucker rivals class of 1994

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Sports

Not since the freshman class of 1994 have the Massachusetts men's hockey team had such an impressive list of first year players.

Even though at this point the class of 2000 does not have the star power of its 1998 compatriots, such as forwards Dean Campanale, Chris Fawcett, Brian Fitzgerald, and Dan Juden, defensemen Mike Gallney, Brad Norton and Tom O'Connor in addition to goaltender Brian Regan, UMass still will be looking to live in the glory of youth.

Nathan Sell

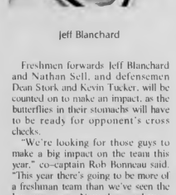
Jeff Blanchard

Freshmen forwards Jeff Blanchard and Nathan Sell, and defensemen Dean Stork and Kevin Tucker, will be counted on to make an impact, as the butterflies in their stomachs will have to be ready for opponent's cross checks.

"We're looking for those guys to make a big impact on the team this year," co-captain Rob Bonneau said. "This year there's going to be more of a freshman team than we've seen the last two years. Now that we have a few losses [due to graduation], we're going to need some help with scoring."

Blanchard has been impressive in his preseason training, as he has proved to be one of the fastest, if not the fastest, skaters for the Minutemen. He has already shown his more than adequate offensive skills in the game of hockey. The relatively diminutive 5-foot-10 native of Stouffville, Ontario will probably be matched up on a line with 6-foot-5 sophomore forward Steve MacKinnon.

He has had a lot of help with his hockey game from his family over the years, as his uncle used to play with the Boston Bruins. You may have heard of him, he played for the B's in the late 1960's through the 1970's. His name is Bobby Orr.



"Jeff Blanchard has outstanding speed and great hockey sense," Mallen said. "He's going to be a definite asset to the program this season."

Bonneau has seen his quickness and skills and Tim Lovell, a 1995-96 preseason and regular season All-Hockey East selection while at the University of Maine, has noticed those hockey traits in Blanchard, too.

"He is a very good player, and he has been smart and fast in the preseason," Lovell said. "I think he will do very well, and he should turn out to be real good."

Nathan Sell will be bringing some more size to the forward position for UMass, as his 6-foot-3, 210 pound frame can only fill out and strengthen up more in a typical Joe Mallen training regimen. The Pembroke, Ontario, and Fellowes High School star is a very intelligent player with strong hands, and will be looked upon to play a variety of roles. Sell will see time in such spots as center, left wing, and both power play and penalty kill. The junior and senior year team captain scored 55 goals in his final season, along with 41 assists, and made a trip to the Central Junior Hockey League All-Star Game.

It has been a long wait for Dean Stork, but he will finally be able to pull on the maroon and white this season, as he had to sit out last season due to a NCAA Clearing House decision. Stork played three years of Junior A Hockey in the British Columbia Junior Hockey League, and won the Best Defenseman Award for the Penticton Panthers in the 1994-95 season. He adds to the growing list of UMass players over six feet tall, and his toughness has already been seen and felt by his teammates.

Dean Stork

"It was tough last year expecting him to play, and then all of a sudden not having him when the Clearing House thing fell through," Norton said. "It's good to have him this year, and he'll help out a lot."

"Dean Stork is very solid, and for a freshman, he doesn't play like one," Regan said. "He has got his feet wet, and at first [in the 6-0 exhibition win over Concordia] he looked a little shaky, but as things have gone on it seems like things have started clicking they way we want it to be."

Kevin Tucker

For Mallen, Stork's rocky road to the William D. Mullins Center has finally come to its destination, and he is more than pleased to have him in a Minuteman uniform.

"We are very pleased to add Dean Stork," Mallen said. "I think he could be one of the best freshman defensemen in the league this year.

"He's big, he's steady, he's strong, and I think that it is going to take him a little while to get going, kind of like the situation with Donta Bright, when he came off a year in waiting. I think it might take him a little bit of time, but he is going to be good."

The towering defense for UMass continues with Kevin Tucker, who is another 6-foot-5 presence in the mold of Brad Norton. He could provide the Minutemen with their own version of the Twin Towers, as he should be teamed up with Norton to form one of the most imposing tandems in Hockey East.

Tucker teamed up with Blanchard on the Caledon Canadians in the Tier II Junior Hockey League, and with his past and present teammate, has a good understanding of the game. The Canadians won two Metro Division Championships while he was there, and his possible linemate hopes that kind of success will be brought this season to the Minutemen.

"He's going to be a good player," Norton said. "He's just keeping it simple right now, moving the puck up the ice, but he's going to be a very good player."

year and be the leader that he is right now on our team, and if we are going to win, it is going to be up to him and a few other guys."

Perry agreed.

No Respect

This is the year that everyone around UMass hockey circles has pointed to as the breakthrough year for the junior goalie from New Milford, Conn., but in Hockey East circles, this has not been the case. The preseason goaltender picks for the conference, in the position where in street-games as a kid you never wanted to be picked, was one legitimate choice, Dan Dennis of Providence College, and one marginal choice, Martin Fillion of UMass-Lowell.

There are a plethora of fine goaltenders in the league, including Greg Taylor of Boston College and Martin Legault of Merrimack, but omitting Regan, who has led UMass to upsets (51 saves in 4-2 win over No. 1 Maine on 1/28/95) and gritty wins (allowing one goal in 5-4 Alumni Cup win over UMass-Lowell last Feb. 10th), is a minor case of anemic respect. But for Regan, he takes it all in stride, and sees the lack of respect as more of a team-wide situation.

"I don't even worry about it, we don't get a lot of respect in this league," Regan said. "We got a little bit more this year than previous years, but the way we are looking at it is that we have one goal... and that is to make it to the FleetCenter [Hockey East semifinals]. Any team that is in our way is just a stepping stone to reach our goal."

One of the biggest fans of the junior goaltender is the coach himself, a former goalie back in his collegiate days at Michigan State. But he believes it is going to take the team, and his defense, to help carry the burden for last season's team MVP, and the 1994-95 Hockey East All-Rookie Team selection.

"I think that other teams may be looking at our record, but I feel he is one of the top goaltenders in the league, hands down," Mallen said. "It is going to take us to win more games in Hockey East next year for him to give him the type of recognition he deserves.

"He was an All-Rookie goalie in this league, which is great. But when he became the All-Rookie goalie, I said to myself, now I would like to see him be the All-League goalie, at least as a senior. If he could do that it would be a great accomplishment, and I think that is within his grasp."

Bonneau and Perry see the same thing for their buttermate, with the proof in the figurative pudding as his play on the ice. The main problem for UMass, on the defensive side of the frozen pond, has been allowing too many shots on goal (Regan ranks 2nd on the career saves list with 1,421), and Bonneau wants to let his goalie sit back and enjoy the game once in a while.

"I think he is right up there in the top of the league," Bonneau said. "He proves it every night, with our team giving up way too many shots, to tell you the truth.

"Night in and night out he is always there for us, and we are going to start this year and hopefully play a little bit better team defense for him, and keep the shots down."

"This is his third year here, and the last two years he has been unbelievable," Perry said. "I think he is one of the top three goalies in this league, and I think he looks great so far. So, hopefully he continues it throughout the year."

One of the newcomers in this season's camp, former University of Maine star Tim Lovell, has seen Regan from the outside, and is now looking in at his teammate.

"I think Regan is underrated in the league," Lovell said. "He is a very good goaltender, and I would say, one of the top goalies in the league. Where I'm from, I have seen some good ones, and he rates up there with them all."

Steady development

Through the first two seasons of Regan's tenure between the pipes, he has had his ups and downs, but he has also gone beyond the team's, and more surprisingly, his own expectations. The road to the William D. Mullins Center began at the Westminster School, where he was an All-New England selection in 1994 and, with no surprise, the team MVP in 1992 and 1994.

His goals against percentage has been steadily lowering the past two years in the maroon and white, as it has dropped from 4.84 in 1994-95 to 4.50 last season. While his save percentage as been basically the same (.871 in '94-'95, .869 in '95-'96), he did start in eight more games than his first season, making 183 more saves in 476 more minutes.

In his completely unassuming fashion, he looks at his own development as pleasing, but in a context where he has done what he has to do.

"I can't complain," Regan said. "I have done things in the past two years that I did not think I could do, and the amount of playing time I have got is more than I ever expected.

"The only thing left that we have to do is just start winning big, and I think that this team has a good chance of doing it."

The defense for the Minutemen has left Regan to weather offensive upheavals from top ten teams like Boston University, Maine and the University of New Hampshire in previous seasons. But the King Patrick (Roy) fan has liked what he has seen so far in his partners in defense — especially junior Brad Norton, who played Cup competition with the U.S. Select Team in the land of a thousand lakes, Finland, in the beautiful inland city of Tampere this past summer.

"The defense has been looking very good," Regan said. "It's nice, with all of the defensemen that came in my freshman year, we all have kind of gelled together. It's like we know what each other is going to do before we do it.

"It is a nice collective group, and the newcomers [freshmen Dean Stork and Kevin Tucker] have added more balance and depth to it. So, we are really excited, it looks like we are going to cut down our goals against a lot, which we need to do."

In the eyes of the coach, the development of his No. 1 guy has been in all facets of the game, with the complexities of the game becoming simpler and simpler.

"His development has been very, very strong, in terms of refining his body, getting stronger and being in better shape," Mallen said. "His mental toughness has improved, and just as you move up the ladder in the goal, you really learn the little fine points about the game. You know, do this, and don't do that.

"He has really picked up a lot of that learning through [assistant coach] Bob Deraney, and he has really improved his overall play because of his accumulating of knowledge, and the ability to execute it."

For Regan, it is simple, he just wants to get the season going, and get the wins on the board.

"We just want to get to Lowell, and start seeing teams in our league, and start beating teams in our league, especially at the beginning of the year. It helps the team so much to get off to a good start," Regan said.

"We have two with Lowell, two with BU, and two with UNH, so those are some of the top teams in the nation. If we come out of there looking good, we have a real good chance for the rest of the season."

Hittin' the road Hockey East-style

Leigh Torbin

Do you know what the best part about being a Hockey East fan is, regardless of your school affiliation, except for the Maine-iacs?

Unlike following the basketball team, which should log you enough frequent flyer miles to get you a free ticket to Philly for the Atlantic 10 finale at St. Joseph's, any UMass hockey game is easily do-able as a two-hour or less day trip, inexpensive and most of all, fun.

As a culmination of years of attending Hockey East games both here and as a wee young laddie outside of Boston, I offer these tips and advice on following the Minutemen, something both myself and coach Mallen encourage you to do at some point this year.

Boston College:

Ticket info: (617) 552-3000
Availability: Never a problem
Getting there: Not bad at all by Boston standards.
Advice: Eat before hand, BC tuition's cheaper than a hot dog at Conte. Tickets ain't cheap either. The place is like Mullins in that it's an actual big-time arena, a rarity in this league. We're talking color replay screens here folks. All this could be yours for $25,000 a year.

Boston University:

Ticket info: (617) 353-2872
Availability: Possible, but call now even for standing room
Getting there: Prepare for a lovely driving experience. Make sure your horn works, blinker doesn't and always remember in this town... the car with the most dents has the right of way. Also, best of luck getting home because the Storrow Drive exit you come in on is one way.
Advice: The world's second best pizza joint, T. Anthony's is right across Comm. Ave. Get a slice or the best Chicken Parm. sub in the hub. Walter Brown Arena generally is not the best place to root for the road team, especially if you happen to be next to either the Ogre or Sasquatch. It would most assuredly suck to BU at that point.

Maine:

Ticket info: (207) 581-BEAR
Availability: Tough, especially since we're up there for Senior Day
Getting there: Take 95 north to the absolute middle of flippin' nowhere. Proceed for two more hours, take Exit 51 and follow the signs.
Advice: If you're making this trip and don't either work for or date someone on the team, you really should either seek professional help or just get a stinkin' life. That said, first one to Alfond Arena is the biggest UMass fan of all time. The natives in Orono are friendly though and will welcome you with large open arms and an all in the family feeling if you catch my drift. Go a little north of the booming metropolis (yes, don't be afraid now, there is something north of Orono) for some quality cow tipping if the bar (Margarita's) gives you the proverbial boot. Oh, and there is no truth to the rumor that the cold and desolate area was the inspiration behind the ice planet Hoth from The Empire Strikes Back. It's coooooooold up there.

UMass-Lowell:

Ticket info: (508) 934-4UML
Availability: Might be sold out, call early, the real UMass is a big road draw amongst the lesser branch's envious fans.
Getting there: Quick jaunt down route 2. Don't forget to stop at the McDonalds in Groton with the wicked cool play ground, and short cut to 495 down route 2A.
Advice: Talk about an inferiority complex, or a just plain inferior complex. This is UML's last year in the rat trap and good riddance. Better stop at the McD's because you'll miss half a period waiting in the one food line, or one bathroom line, either of which moves like the New York Jets' offense.

Merrimack:

Ticket info: (508) 837-5341, but there's no need to call
Availability: They will probably sell out a non-BU game sometime during the Perot administration
Getting there: Just past Lowell on 495, stop at the same MickeyD's.
Advice: Schools concerned with their PR often give us media types free food at games, or at least a Coke or something. Merrimack gives us hot chocolate, that's usually cold by the time it reaches the "press box." Personally, I'd rather play in my high school rink, although it didn't have heat lamps like at a DC hanging over the bleachers. Oh, the ambiance. Bundle up like you're going to a game in, well, Orono. Bring ear plugs too, Helen Keller's a better DJ.

New Hampshire:

Ticket info: (603) 862-2287
Availability: Not bad
Getting there: A long crawl to nowhere, but still just halfway to Maine.
Advice: A beautiful modern arena that isn't too hard to find, the flood lights being the brightest thing for miles, dubbed the aurora borealis, by last year's Collegian traveling party. Food is way too expensive, even worse than BC, so eat before hand by the mall just off of 95. The UNH fans are cool behind the visiting net, and one anonymous UMass official says the rest rooms (men's and women's) are the best anywhere and worth the trip themselves.

Northeastern:

Ticket info: (617) 373-4700
Availability: Not even an issue: come one, come all
Getting there: One of the few places in downtown Boston that's easy to get too, just don't go on Mass. Ave. much farther south than the arena.
Advice: Maybe my favorite Hockey East road trip. Get there early so you can park for under five grand, and eat in the Back Bay, or if it's bad walking weather, try the Uno's on Huntington Ave., a block away. Tons of incredible bars nearby for post game, try Dad's on Boylston or Daisy's on Newbury. The arena itself makes this place worthwhile, a real hockey barn where the Bruins played before moving into the Garden, with a lot of character.

Providence:

Ticket info: (401) 865-2271
Availability: Not too tough for UMass
Getting there: Not too tough off of route 146, Admiral Street exit, brutal from anywhere else.
Advice: Can't say much, just another stop on an endless tour really. Good parking, cheap seats and good sight lines. The weirdest mascot though, some eight foot dragon-type thing that walks around the stands, gets in your way, and leaves you wondering when Toys 'R' Us fired baby Jeffrey.

UM defense strong for '96

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Sports

If numbers in the game of hockey speak volumes, then the defensive corps of the Massachusetts hockey team has War and Peace written all over it. Over the past two seasons, the UMass team defense has had its troubles adjusting to the level of Division I competition, as its team goals-against average has consistently been over the four goal mark (4.96 in 1994-95, 4.49 in 1995-96).

But this season, a battle-hardened trio of experienced players will return for the Minutemen, as juniors Mike Gaffney, Tom O'Connor and Brad Norton will be the backbone for a steadily improving back-line of defense. Coach Joe Mallen has noticed the improvement so far this preseason, and looks to the threesome to start giving the team some defensive peace of mind.

"I think on defense we are starting to see that junior trio of Mike Gaffney, Tom O'Connor and Brad Norton come into their own, and I think that is a real good nucleus," Mallen said. "We look as if those guys are maturing on a good pace, they are understanding the game a little bit better, and they are in a position right now to be more of leaders than they were followers in the last few years. So, I think our defense is really going to be solid."

One of the players who has received some extra schooling in the least publicized, but most important, part of the game of hockey is Brad Norton. This past summer the 1993 draft choice of the Edmonton Oilers did not go north of the border, but over The Pond, as he played with the U.S. Select Team in the Tampere Cup. The inland city in Finland was the place for Norton to work on his game on a higher level of competition, and he hopes that will translate back to his college game.

"I think its helped a lot with my skating, playing over in Europe emphasizes that, and it is a lot of hard work," Norton said. "I think this is a very important year, and where the program is going to go for the team, and myself."

"We'll definitely try to cut down on the penalty minutes, that will help, and play a lot less of penalty kill than we have in the past. I think the experience we will bring back this season will help us a lot."

Experienced top line to lead team

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Sports

The hallmark of any truly great hockey team at any level is a dynamic line.

The Gallery Gods at the FleetCenter still rave about the Bruins' Kraut line of Hall of Famers Milt Schmidt, Woody Dumart and Bobby Bauer. That gave way to Philadelphia's Broad Street Bullies of the 1970's, Bobbie Clark, Rick Leach and Ken Barber. Today's top NHL line also cashes its paychecks in the City of Brotherly love, the Legion of Doom, featuring Eric Lindros, John LeClair and Mikael Renberg.

The college game is the same. Paul Kariya, Jim Montgomery and Cal Ingraham brought a title downeast to Maine's Alfond Arena in 1993. Last year, Jay Pandolfo, Chris Drury and Mike Grier clicked as Boston University's top combination, leading the team to a final four appearance.

While Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen might not mistake his top combo of Tom Perry, Warren Norris and Rob Bonneau with Pittsburgh's power play combo of Mario Lemieux, Jaromir Jagr and Ron Francis, he none the less expects the combination of three seniors to be one of the top units in Hockey East.

"I think that this line can be one of the better lines in the league, no doubt," Mallen said. "I don't think up until this point we've had a real go-to line, while almost every team we've played has. I hope that down the stretch that this line is going to be the line that scores goals late in the game."

The line is finely crafted as well. Perry brings a physical presence at left wing alongside the Norris-Bonneau combo. Norris and Bonneau were frequently paired together and center and right wing, but had several skaters to their left last year.

Perry worked with the unit on an odd shift or two, and as a trigger man on the team's power play unit, but never on a daily basis. One would never know this though from watching the team's preseason exhibition drubbings of Concordia University of Montreal and the Polish National Team, where the line clicked well, producing several goals.

"Tom Perry's never played consistently with these two guys, where as Warren and Rob have played a ton," Mallen said. "It gives them a different left wing to work with but right off the bat the chemistry's been good. They've been moving the puck real well, and they talk well."

Sticking with the senior trio motif, Mallen has put Keith O'Connell, Gerry Cahill and Judd Smith together to start the season as well. UMass has its highest experience levels since the reinstatement of the program and is not afraid to use it in search for its first Hockey East semifinal berth and skate on the FleetCenter ice.

Regan's work ethic is Minutemen's net gain

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Sports

It's simple...

When it comes to being the No. 1 man between the pipes for the Massachusetts hockey team, Brian Regan's work ethic is simple. Win games, and nothing else.

It is a curious philosophy for someone who lists a Shakespearian tragedy (MacBeth) as his favorite read, but he does not get into multi-dimensional, explicit analysis of his hockey game. He will be one of the keys to Minutemen success this season in Hockey East, which is one of the toughest collegiate hockey conferences in America, and you do not have to do much reading into that fact.

"The only thing I concern myself about is wins and losses," Regan said. "As long as I am giving the team a chance to win night-in and night-out, then I am doing my job. If I am not doing that, then I do not belong in the net."

While Regan might dare all to become the man in goal, his own method of dealing with the task at hand is more pluralistic in nature: team-referential. He will be the first one to talk about his team, where coach Joe Mallen and his teammates, like co-captains Rob Bonneau and Tom Perry, will be the first to talk about him.

"I feel very strong about our goaltending right now, and Brian is our go-to guy. there is no doubt about that," Mallen said. "As he goes, we'll go, and as we go, he'll go. In other words, if he plays well, we will win a lot of games, and if we win a lot of games, he'll get the credit."

For Bonneau and Perry, the ones who have been peppering the young vet with shots all preseason, they think that he is at his best form to date.

"He looks excellent, and this is probably the best I have seen him since he has been here," Bonneau said. "He has let in, maybe, two goals since we have been scrimmaging, and he is playing well, which is going to be a big thing for us."

"We need our goalie to step up this

Hockey East Capsule Previews

Boston College Eagles
Location: Chestnut Hill, Mass.
Head Coach: Jerry York
Career record: 494-374-39
Home arena: Conte Forum (cap. 7,884)
Top returning players: G Greg Taylor (16–15–3, 3.75 GAA); F Marty Reasoner (16 goals–29 assists–45 points); D David Wainright (2–6–8); D Joe Harney (2–6–8); D Ken Hemenway (12–12–24).
1995–96 Record: 16–17–3
Hockey East: 12–10–2 (5th)
Team synopsis: The team will be captained this season by senior defensemen Joe Harney and David Wainright, and the offense will be led by preseason All–Hockey East selection Marty Reasoner. A unanimous Hockey East Rookie of the Year selection, Reasoner led all rookies with 43 points (16 goals, 27 assists), and won nine Rookie of the Week and four Rookie of the Month awards. BC is picked for third in the preseason coaches poll, and Marty is the reason why.

Boston University Terriers
Location: Boston, Mass.
Head Coach: Jack Parker
Career record: 523–248–40
Home Arena: Walter Brown Arena (cap. 3,684)
Top returning players: F Chris Drury (35 goals, 32 assists, 67 points); F Shawn Bates (28–22–50); D Jon Coleman (7–31–38); G Tom Noble (19–3–2, 2.97 GAA).
1995–96 Record: 30–7–3
Hockey East: 17–3–2 (1st)
Team synopsis: Even with the loss of star players like Jay Pandolfo, Chris O'Sullivan and Mike Grier, the Terriers still have a bite to them with three preseason All–Hockey East selections: Drury, Bates and Coleman. It does not suck to be them, as they have added one of the top recruiting classes in the country, highlighted by the addition of defenseman Tom Poti from Cushing Academy. Behind one of the best defenses in the league, Tom Noble has the best numbers in HE, but can you say over–rated? Jack Parker can not, but Noble is not a major problem for him this season.

Maine Black Bears
Location: Orono, Maine
Head Coach: Shawn Walsh
Career Record: 289–171–26
Home Arena: Alfond Arena (cap. 5,200)
Top returning players: F Dan Shermerhorn (20 goals–23 assists–43 points); F Shawn Wansborough (27–16–43); Scott Parmentier (12–12–24); F Steve Kariya (7–15–22).
1995–96 Record: 26–9–4
Hockey East: 14–6–4 (T–2nd)
Team synopsis: When you lose three of your best players in F Tim Lovell (transfer to UMass), G Blair Allison, and Jeff Tory (both to the Canadian National team) to some little coaching scandal, the obvious remark would be that it is time to put Shawn Walsh out to pasture. B—L—U—E! You're program is Black and Blue! Not true, as they have been picked by the coaches to finish in the middle of the pack (4th), and they do have two preseason All–Hockey East selections in Shermerhorn and D Jason Mansoff (8–9–17). Sorry, no postseason for the Black Bears this year, due to that minor paperwork error.

Massachusetts Minutemen
Location: Amherst, Mass.
Head Coach: Joe Mallen
Career Record: 116–110–10
Home Arena: William D. Mullins Center (cap. 8,389)
Top returning players: G Brian Regan (7–16–4, 4.50 GAA); F Rob Bonneau (17–16–33); F Jason Disalvatore (5–6–11); F Tom Perry (5–6–11); F Warren Norton (6–5–11); D Josh Langfeld (2–9–11).
1995–96 Record: 15–18–4
Hockey East: 9–15–4 (8th)
Team synopsis: The Minutemen are the only team in Hockey East, if not in all of UMass, to not lose seven players from last season's squad, and not lose much in quality. The team needs to improve on their shots allowed, as the past two seasons the UMass net has been more of a firing line than a last line of defense. The first line of Perry–Norris–Bonneau has the potential to be one of the best in the league, and Norton should be a strong defensive presence after a summer on the U.S. Select team. The freshman class should help UMass break the HE Top 4.

Massachusetts–Lowell River Hawks
Location: Lowell, Mass.
Head Coach: Tim Whitehead
Career Record: First year
Home Arena: Tully Forum (cap. 6,000)
Top Returning Players: F Jason Bonsignore (23–20–43); F Marc Salsman (17–17–34); G Martin Legault (2.63, 3.79 GAA)
1995–96 Record: 26–10–4
Hockey East: 16–6–4 (2nd)
Team Synopsis: H[illegible] graduation and the loss of coach Bruce Crowder, this could be a rebuilding year for UMass–Lowell after a 1995–96 season that saw them in the NCAA quarterfinals. In addition to many graduates, several underclassmen left after Crowder, including [illegible] who signed with the New York Rangers. Lowell will have to [illegible] Marcel Pilloon, a surprising preseason All–Hockey East selection, who has been suspended by new coach Tim Whitehead for the first four games, including the season–opening UMass series. Freshmen need to step up immediately for the River Hawks to avoid the basement.

Merrimack Warriors
Location: North Andover, Mass.
Head Coach: Ron Anderson
Career Record: 229–204–21
Home Arena: Volpe Complex (cap. 3,617)
Top Returning Players: G Martin Legault (6–9–5, 2.92 GAA); F Rob Beck (16–19–35); D John Jakopin (10–15–25); F Martin Laroche (16–16–32)
1995–96 Record: 10–19–5
Hockey East: 4–18–2 (9th)
Team synopsis: The Warriors will look to Martin Leagult to keep the team in many games this year. The surprise addition of former Cushing Academy star Jayson Philbin will boost the team, but this could be another long winter for coach Ron Anderson's troops. Steve McKenna bolted for La–La–Land and a minor league deal in the Los Angeles King system, breaking up the league's original twin–towers of he and John Jakopin. Without a defense before him, Legault, and the team, will not go far.

New Hampshire Wildcats
Location: Durham, NH
Head Coach: Dick Umile
Career Record: 221–87–14
Home Arena: Whittemore Center (cap. 6,000)
Top Returning Players: F Tim Regnaud (24–29–53); F Mark Mowers (21–26–47); F Eric Nickulas (20–12–32); G Brian Larochelle (3–7–1, 4.02 GAA)
1995–96 Record: 12–18–4
Hockey East: 8–12–4 (6th)
Team synopsis: After an unexpected run to the title last year in 1996, the Wildcats could very well [illegible] Laughlin Cup as Hockey East champions in March. UNH's top forwards, Mark Mowers, Eric Boguniecki and Eric Nickulas, really is a sight to behold, especially on the defensemen from last year, but the quick glove of Brian Larochelle in goal will help show that last year was just an aberration for a perennial power that will rise again in 1996–97.

Northeastern Huskies
Location: Boston, Mass.
Head Coach: Bruce Crowder
Career Record: 99–75–19
Home Arena: Matthews Arena (cap. 6,000)
Top Returning Players: F Scott Campbell (20–12–32); D Arttu Kayhko (6–16–22); F Jon Calla (7–6–13); F Erik Kaminiski (5–8–13)
1995–96 Record: 10–21–5
Hockey East: 6–13–5 (7th)
Team synopsis: Former UMass–Lowell head coach Bruce Crowder will turn around the HMS Huskies and restore the glories of the 1980s for the Huntington Hockey. It might take a few years, but watch out for the Huskies. For now, however, we must settle on a goaltender after the graduation of a pair of dandies in Tim Vesey and Todd Reynolds. The loss of strong defenseman Danny McGilis, now skating regularly with the Edmonton Oilers, will sting. Scott Campbell leads the forward corps, which is strong, but was underused in a defensive system last year.

Providence College Friars
Location: Providence, RI
Head Coach: Paul Pooley
Career Record: 55–52–9
Home Arena: Schneider Arena (cap. 3,050)
Top Returning Players: G Tim Dennis (13–13–3, 3.33 GAA); F Russ Guzior (20–17–37); F Howard Dunn (15–21–36); F Stefan Brannare (13–16–29)
1995–96 Record: 21–15–3
Hockey East: 12–9–3 (4th)
Team synopsis: Led by [illegible] Russ Guzior, a Hobbs All– America candidate between the pipes and the brilliant defensive-oriented system of coach Paul Pooley, the Friars turned heads on Comm. Ave. and downeast, stunning Boston University and Maine in the FleetCenter en route to the Hockey East championship and an NCAA bid. Using a New Jersey Devilesque neutral zone trap, PC took a team that was predicted near the basement into the penthouse, with simple hard–work and discipline. Mad cow disease still threatens British beef

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) — Boosted by new research linking mad cow disease to a human brain ailment, the European Union said Thursday that its ban on British beef sales would continue until Britain begins a selective cattle slaughter program.

"What the British scientists have discovered shows how serious the crisis is," said Franz Fischler, the EU's farm commissioner.

Fischler said the ban would remain in place until Britain honors a deal, reached at an EU summit in June, to slaughter 147,000 young cattle deemed most at risk for mad cow disease.

"The cull has to take place," EU spokesman Gerry Kiely said. In a study released Wednesday, British scientists said they have found the same molecular pattern in both mad cow disease and Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease, a fatal brain-wasting ailment in humans. The research gives more credence to the theory that humans can catch Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease by eating meat from infected cattle.

Kerry & Weld sound off in personal debate

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — Gov. William F. Weld and Sen. John Kerry discussed ethics in their latest U.S. Senate debate, but they also showed their differing personalities after being asked about the most agonizing decisions in their lives.

Kerry, considered the more somber candidate in the race, told a panelist that outside of his time in Vietnam, his toughest choices involved his divorce from his first wife and how that affected his two daughters.

"That's the toughest thing in the world and I think it cost me a great deal over a long period of time, not to mention what I think it cost them. I think anybody who has gone through that process knows how wrenching and difficult it is," a grave-looking Kerry said during Wednesday's debate at Springfield Technical Community College.

Kerry added, however, "I think in the end things have worked out."

Weld, considered the more affable candidate in the race, was almost flippant when he replied: "I have the misfortune of having had a happy childhood and a happy adulthood."

Five College women march for equality

Speakers address empowerment; women advocate choices, control

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Staff

Amherst Commons was host yesterday to the National Young Women's Day of Action rally at 4 p.m., sponsored by Five College women.

National Women's Day of Action began in the Five College area in 1992 at Hampshire College to commemorate the death of Rosie Jiminez, the first known woman to die from an illegal abortion.

She died because she was unwilling to use the $700 check in her pocket and opted for an illegal abortion. She wanted to use the money for an education.

Jiminez's death was about lack of choices — a result of the passage of the Hyde Amendment, which was a virtual ban of abortion coverage for low–income women.

One of the goals of the National Young Women's Day of Action seeks to respond to the climate that fosters limiting of young women's choices such as reproductive freedom, racial and ethnic justice, education, jobs, domestic violence, health care, lesbian and bisexual rights, welfare rights, child care and disability rights.

Smith College student Rachel Bogan said the reason she attended the rally and march was "to support women and our rights. At least my voice is being heard."

Alexis Fish, also a Smith College student said she felt "a responsibility to support women here and support the causes they're fighting for."

Tina Cincotti, a senior women's studies major and University of Massachusetts organizer began describing the National Young Women's Day of Action as an "opportunity to speak out on issues that affect our lives."

The issues Cincotti spoke of "are about control, control over our own lives." When speaking about "our lives" Cincotti addressed white women specifically and their lack of activism.

"The women's movement has failed women of color. It is our obligation as white women to put our lives and bodies on the line. White does not exist without black," Cincotti said.

Cincotti also made a call for all white women to "dismantle the structure known as whiteness. Never forget the privilege we have being white.

"Racial, social and economic justice effect everyone, that is the reason we are all here. We are the new generation of activists," Cincotti said.

Self–described "token non–young woman," speaker Marlene Fried said it was "empowering to me seeing such strong women. Our generation did not have a Day of Action — there was no clear sense of struggle that linked all issues."

Fried viewed the Day of Action as an "opportunity to vent our individual isolated rage and turn it into collective power."

Some of the things that angered Fried centered around the presidential election.

"Whoever wins, we're going to hold his feet to the fire," she said.

Fried asked, "Is it pro–choice to sign a welfare bill that throws millions of women into poverty, to sign a bill to veto late term abortions, or oppose gay marriage?" She cited these as examples of Clinton's policies she opposes.

Regardless of the outcomes of the elections Fried vowed the "roar of resistance that is so loud, it will shut them up."

The last speaker before the march was Kelly Facto, from the Common Ground of Western Massachusetts, who discussed the reality of being a woman and being homeless.

Facto, who has been homeless four times in the last 10 years has lived with the fear that "homelessness can happen to anyone."

"Homelessness is watching your son be sick and not being able to take him anywhere, worrying your child might be taken away if police find you in your car, worrying if your belongings will still be in your car when you wake up."

Facto concluded that "there are homeless people in Amherst, but they're kept covered up."

The National Young Women's Day of Action kicked off yesterday with a rally on the Student Union steps at 12 p.m. sponsored by the Progressive Organization for Women's Rights (POWER).

Student Government Senator and the Founder and Chair of the Senate Committee on Women's Issues, Stacey Shackford began by stressing the importance of women's involvement in politics 76 years after the ratification of the Suffrage Amendment.

Shackford stated that "There is no denying the positive impact of women in politics."

Citing a study done in the 103rd Congress, she said women make a difference by "expanding the congressional agenda, insisting on attention to new issues, helping shape the content of legislation, expanding terms of legislative debate, and influencing the fate of legislation."

The political climate here at University of Massachusetts has "failed to meet this challenge," Shackford explained when describing how there was only one woman senator in SGA this semester.

"Women often find attaining and succeeding in campus leadership positions fraught with unique difficulties. Men hold a disproportionate number of leadership positions, especially in the SGA." Shackford said.

The next speaker was Laura Royse, who initiated POWER, and discussed her mother's losing battle with breast cancer after it had spread to her brain. Royse's powerful and painful words echoed to the twentysomething students, men and women, in front of the Student Union Building.

"My goal it to bring some awareness that my mother

Riots ensues after St. Pete shooting

By Lisa Holewa
Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — A rock- and bottle-throwing crowd of several hundred people set fire to businesses and vehicles after police fatally shot a man during a traffic stop yesterday evening. Several officers were injured in the riot, which involved more than 200 people and continued to rage late Thursday night. Building fires were burning out of control as the violence kept firefighters from the scene.

"It's just utter chaos," said a police dispatcher who refused to be identified. "We have officers injured, quite a few of them."

Hundreds of officers in riot gear barricaded several streets and tried to contain the violence, carrying plastic shields to fend off rocks and other debris. Groups of youths were running back and forth in the night, aiming at the officers as well as businesses and passing cars.

The White House took an immediate interest in the riot. "We're making inquiries of local officials for an assessment of the situation," White House press secretary Mike McCurry said from New Orleans, where he was on a campaign trip with President Clinton.

Thick black smoke clouded the predominantly black area several blocks south of downtown four hours after the shooting.

"Where the big mistake was when the police put the riot gear on," said one area businessman who asked not to be identified. "That's when all hell broke loose. As soon as it got dark that's when all hell broke loose."

One officer was shot in the arm, but the injury wasn't serious, a dispatcher said. The police spokesman was not

WMUA prepares for fundraiser

Radio station hopes to raise $20K with this year's telethon

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

WMUA, 91.1 FM, the student–run radio station at the University of Massachusetts, will begin its 18th annual fundraising telethon at 6 a.m. on Oct 26. DJ Billy Belina will kick it off with the traditional 15–hour polkathon.

Members of WMUA hope to raise $20,000 during telethon, which will end on Nov. 1.

Last year's telethon raised over $20,000 from more than 750 listeners. Telethon Director David Bloodsworth is very confident that this year's goal will be reached.

UMass' Student Government Association (SGA) granted WMUA $82,000 for this fiscal year, which will cover approximately two–thirds of the station's operating budget. The remaining third must be raised through business underwriting and next week's on–air fundraising.

"Every DJ is required to participate in the telethon and most of them willingly do so," Bloodsworth said.

Programming is not completely interrupted during the telethon, Bloodsworth said. Programs alternate with seven minutes of fundraising and 12 minutes of music throughout the entire week.

Each DJ must set a specific fundraising goal for their specific show or block program. This goal can be set in two ways; either through a set amount of money to be donated during that show or by the number of callers.

For example, a DJ can set a goal of $500 to be raised during his show or he can set a goal of 50 callers.

Each DJ has a pitch partner — "A person who is there to help drum up support," Bloodworth said.

The amount of donations vary — "typically they start at $20, especially for students," Bloodsworth said. However there is no maximum amount that a donation has to be.

"We will accept anything that a person can donate," he said.

Bloodsworth said that campus support is fair.

"The majority of pledges do not come from students. They come from the community. We have very strong ties and support from the community."

As for organizing the entire event, Bloodsworth said its "tough getting organized... because I have no staff."

The telethon department has no other staff because new people who come in to WMUA to get involved find, "raising money isn't as interesting as being a DJ," he said.

Bloodsworth said that at a recent meeting, new members were given an opportunity to meet with the head of the departments within WMUA that they were interested in working with and that "there where about 20 people at news and sports while the Public Affairs director and I talked to only two."

"Eventually people tend to get involved in other areas once all the exciting departments have been explored," he said.

Bloodsworth said he became the telethon director after he applied for the News Director position which was filled by another applicant. He was then given the option of being Telethon Director and accepted.

"I accepted it because I thought it would be a great challenge for me and so far it has," he said. "It's a lot of work."

In order to prepare for the telethon, Bloodsworth must solicit many local businesses for special premiums, businesses donate concert tickets, gift certificates and CD's to give to callers who donate specific amounts of money.

WMUA will also be giving out t–shirts and hats as their station as gifts for donations.

Depending on the amount of the donation, callers will be eligible for the gifts.

The new pledge line is (413) 577–3000.

Bike racks installed on PVTA buses

Good news for bikers as the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) has unveiled plans to install bike racks on their buses.

This pilot program was intiated through a $82,000 federal grant and will put bike racks on 25 buses that run in the Amherst area.

North Amherst and Belchertown Road will be the first routes to come into the program, with South Amherst, Sunderland and South Deerfield routes getting racks in the spring semester.

"That will be great," said Paul Dohoney, senior political science major. "When I ride my bike to school and it starts raining I can just throw it on the bus and ride home. This is awesome."

According to the PVTA, "Rack and Roll," as the program is called, came from complaints from riders who can not bring their bikes inside the bus.

"The hope is that it is well recieved and if it is we will expand into new areas," said Michelle Goldberg, Director of Marketing and Public Relations for the PVTA.

The program will begin on Oct. 23 and continue until Nov. 15. During the winter, the racks will be stored until the program restarts March 24.

Brochures explaining how to use the bike racks will be available at local bike shops, libraries, PVTA buses and by calling PVTA at 586–5806. These racks will be accessible without the aid of the bus driver and are free to riders.

Donations solicited for homeless

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

Shelter Sunday is not simply about raising money for the homeless, but about "neighbors caring about neighbors," said Hill Boss, an Amherst Selectboard member.

This Sunday, volunteers will be knocking on the doors of Amherst residences collecting donations that will be distributed to various charity organizations such as the Amherst Survival Center, Not Bread Alone, the Grove Street Inn and the Amherst Charitable Fund, according to Amy de Roode, a member of the Amherst Friends for the Homeless (AFH).

"I feel very strongly about this," Boss said, who is also a member of AFH. "If Amherst cannot take care of the problems of homelessness within its home town limits, there's something terribly wrong."

In the past years, Shelter Sunday has been able to collect between $12,000–$15,000. De Roodes said cuts in welfare programs have made these donations even more important.

The money collected from Shelter Sunday makes up for a large portion of these shelters' budgets, said De Roodes.

According to Boss, because Amherst is a wealthy town, "it is embarrassing that we have this problem."

"Shelter Sunday is not just to raise money, but its also to raise awareness in the community," de Roodes said. "The perception that most people who are homeless are so far gone is not true. That's not the whole group."

De Roode said that these displaced citizens are not necessarily blatantly apparent to most residents.

In fact, de Roode related how she had worked an entire day with a well-dressed man, John, who had volunteered his services for Shelter Sunday. It was not until the end of the day that this man revealed that he did not have a home.

"We need to get beyond the perception of wealth, the perception that Amherst doesn't have a problem because you are not walking over bodies," de Roode said.

The donations requested are "whatever you can offer," she said. Donations can also include volunteering time.

"We actually had a guy donate the shirt off his back," de Roode said. The shirt was given to a shelter that distributed clothes.

The reason de Roode gives for Shelter Sunday's tremendous success is that it "builds on relationships that are already there within the community."

"I felt that it should be dealt primarily on a local level with neighbors caring about neighbors," Boss said. Boss does not feel comfortable relying on federal and state level aid.

Both Boss and de Roode said they hope students at the University of Massachusetts participate.

Boss said he was thrilled that there was such an enormous response by the students.

He said that there are approximately 65 students from Greek Residential Area at the UMass and 35 from the Boltwood Project signed up to volunteer this year.

De Roode added that entire floors of Coolidge Residence Hall in the Southwest Residential Area also have plans to participate.

"College kids are absolutely essential to making it [Shelter Sunday] a success," Boss said.

Scott MacNeil, a senior HRTA major and resident of Coolidge, said that one of his colleagues had brought Shelter Sunday to the attention of the residents, and "we made it bigger than he expected."

For more information or if interested in volunteering, contact Amy de Roode at 467–9264.

The rally followed with a march from Amherst Commons down North Pleasant St., past fraternity row and concluded in front of the People's Market where a candlelight vigil and words of encouragement were spoken by the crowd.

While the women marched they chanted songs such as "Wherever we are, wherever we go, yes means yes and no means no." "Bob Dole — No Way. Racist, sexist, anti-gay."

Once the marchers passed fraternity row, brothers were seen and heard in windows yelling "go home," and heckling and laughing at passers by while standing comfortably on their porches and lawns.

One fraternity brother of Phi Mu Delta said, "Everyone and has concluded in front of the People's Market where a candlelight vigil and words of encouragement were spoken by the crowd.

Gay literature highlighted in talk

COURTNEY SMITH/COLLEGIAN

Ken Stuckey spoke yesterday on the importance of Lesbian and Gay writing.

By Richard James
Collegian Correspondent

As part of the Stonewall Center Lecture Series, writer and activist Ken Stuckey gave a speech on his experiences with coming out and on his writing Thursday afternoon in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center.

His speech, emitled "Gay and Lesbian Writing: The Ship in the Safe Harbor," discussed his life and how his experiences with coming out have connected with his writing and his understanding of other authors.

Stuckey is an essayist and activist pursuing his doctorate in English with a field of specialty in African–American Literature at Cornell University.

He began his speech with the reading of a letter that he wrote to his parents, coming out to them.

"Writing a coming out letter was not an attempt at taking the easy way out of coming out, instead it was an attempt at precision," Stuckey said.

Stuckey realized that he would only have one chance to make a good first impression when coming out to his parents, so he chose a more tactful way of telling his parents that he was gay.

Despite his painstaking preparation, his parents' reaction to the situation was still emotional. His mother believed that even though his sexuality may not have been his choice, it was still his choice to come out. His dad took offense to the fact that he choose to tell his mother first instead of him and felt the idea of coming out was foolish.

The days to follow were filled with silence, even though they embarked on a trip to Atlanta. Stuckey spent most of his time writing in his journal, locking himself in his room. The silence was brought to a close when his father called him into the living room and said, "You don't have to hide in your room. This is your home too."

Stuckey described the days following his coming out as "If a man had no feeling in his legs after 20 years and he spilled hot coffee in his lap and had the privilege of feeling it scald, the sensation would bring more pleasure than pain. To burn would be a delight to him because with it would come the promise of life in the limbs that he had given up for dead."

After telling of his coming out experience, Stuckey went on to read a poem that he had written to his Uncle Willy who had died of AIDS a few weeks before he came out. It was titled "Bill, I'll call you now".

The poem was written out of the deep pain he felt around his uncle's death, as well as the awkwardness that can often be felt between family members who are closeted. It echoed of the emotions that Stuckey had as he tried to reach out to his uncle for guidance, but only received a handshake.

"In our writing as well as in our lives, we have to learn how not to let the anticipation on someone else's disappointment set the borders of our lives," said Stuckey.

With that statement Stuckey then went on to name the second greatest influence on his writing which is Paul Monette, author of Becoming a Man.

Monette's book has served as an inspiration for Stuckey's writing and gave him the courage that he needed to come out of the closet.

"If you want to acknowledge the good for those who have gone before you must provide a service for those who have yet to come."

Stuckey believed that this is the greatest lesson that he has ever learned. It was because his uncle that he had the courage to tell his parents about the truth of his condition, that his parents were able to welcome him back into their home.

Stuckey believed that gay and lesbian writing has the capacity to reconcile apparent conflict, because it contradicts the traditional narrative of history which often excludes gays and lesbians. It provides a mirror for them to examine themselves and their existence as a community.

"I often wonder what text on gay life could possibly open a mind as closed as Jesse Helms or Pat Buchanan," Stuckey said. He believed that for some people, peace of mind really does come from trying to save gays from themselves much like colonists tried to save the world with Christianity.

"Somewhere blossoming in someone's imagination is the speech that will make it clear to the world what its moral code must be, in the same way that Martin Luther King made it clear to us that it was unrighteous for blacks to suffer in the way that we had in the pre-civil rights era," Stuckey said.

Prof says voters are apathetic

MHC's Doug Amy discusses problems in electoral structure

By Manolis Boutsikos
Collegian Correspondent

Many voters are wasting their ballots under the current system of representation, said Doug Amy, professor of politics at Mt. Holyoke College. His lecture on election reform was held Tuesday evening in the Campus Center at University of Massachusetts.

According to Amy, there is a growing need among the voting public for new and viable political parties and candidates.

"Americans are pretty disillusioned by elections. They are increasingly alienated and apathetic," Amy said.

The problem lies in "a winner take all" system. Amy said that no provision exists to offer representation to voters who, for example, voted Republican in a district which a Democrat prevailed.

"You can go out and vote and still have no voice in our government," he said.

In the 1994 election, Amy said, 26 million votes were "wasted" as a result of the current electoral structure. There were large discrepancies between how the parties fared in the popular vote and the actual seats they won in Congress. He called this "a distortion of representation."

According to Amy, the solution lies in proportional representation; a system mirrored upon European parliamentary governments.

In this system, voting districts are much larger, with multiple seats at stake in each election. The percentage of seats a particular party wins within their district is determined by the percentage of the total votes they earn.

"Third parties [would have] a chance, and voters a wider selection," Amy said, through elections based on proportional representation.

The current system, Amy said, is responsible for low voter turn out in the U.S. He said that a 50 percent voter turnout is considered high in this country; while voters in countries with multi-party elections routinely turn out in excess of 90 percent.

Rather than "choose between the better of two evils," under the current system, an alternative would allow for a more diverse array of candidates.

At the end of his lecture, Amy said that there are many critics of a system based upon proportional representation. Some suggest, he said, that this system would allow for the rise of "extremist groups" such as the Ku Klux Klan. Others say that such a change would lead to a division of political power resulting in legislative gridlock and governmental instability. Amy responded to these critiques by pointing to countries, such as Norway and Sweden, where proportional representation is the system of choice.

Economist: "end nepotism of inheritance"

By Adam Klein
Collegian Correspondent

Two leading economists debated social inequality and the role of federal government Wednesday night at Mt. Holyoke College. The panelists were economists Robert Barro, from Harvard University and Samuel Bowles from the University of Massachusetts.

Barro, a self-proclaimed conservative economist, said that wage inequality has risen steadily since the early 1970's. Despite the increasing wage gap, he said that the lower class in this country are better off than they have ever been in history.

Bowles said that quantitative data should not be the only criteria used to judge the relative happiness of the lower class. Instead, legislators should acknowledge the significance of "indignities that the poor suffer on a daily basis."

Bowles said that the laws government should enforce a more just set of rules, so as to level the playing field between the rich and the poor.

A regressive tax system which favors the ultra-rich would be beneficial to the U.S. economy, said Barro. He demonstrated graphically that a tax system based on the Laffer curve, which shows that lower taxes on higher incomes actually increases tax revenues, was not a complete failure, as critics of Reaganomics often argue.

"The rich reported more income with the lower taxes and tax revenue for that group went up," Barro said. He went on to say that the 1993 Clinton-backed tax hike decreased tax revenue from the rich.

In response, Bowles said the relationship between small adjustments in the tax system and the corresponding changes in tax revenue is too difficult to gauge.

Bowles said that if capital is made more available to the lower class, it makes them more active participants in the market economy. Currently, the lower class is discriminated against in the credit markets, he said. Only then will workers own their means of production and gain dignity.

One audience member asked Bowles what the growth effects of legislating inequality were. Bowles said, "Current property rights are antithetical to productivity." The government should give workers more rights over what they produce.

In his rebuttal, Barro said, "The idea that goverment policy will systematically [legislate] property rights to their most effective use is a joke... democracy stresses redistribution more than growth."

Bowles said one major way to redistribute wealth is to prevent the "nepotism of inheritance." He said redistributing wealth by substantially raising estate taxes removes the unfair advantage of the rich in business and higher education.

Barro disagreed saying that any active redistribution of wealth is adverse to growth.

In concluding comments, Bowles said, "Highly unequal societies are unstable." He did say that redistribution of wealth may adversely affect growth.

Barro asked, "How sacred and unchangeable are property rights?" He did not believe American citizens would permit those rights to be revoked.

The announcer thanked the audience for attending the debate "which was not about one-liners and lack of substance" (comparing it to the Kerry–Weld debate which was at the same time).

should have never died of breast cancer. Breast cancer can be prevented," Royse said. Royse continued by delivering shocking statistics to the attentive audience including "cancer is the leading cause of death of women ages 35–54, of which one-third is due to breast cancer.

The rally concluded with several speakers addressing such issues as self-defense, gay and lesbian issues, bisexuality and definition of feminism summed up by Amy Carpenter, member of POWER.

"It's not about hating men or abortion, it's about all women. Today's feminism is about choices, choices for women to be what they want," Carpenter said.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1903, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call (413) 545-3500 weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Supporting our future

The University of Massachusetts Daily Collegian supports the University's effort to raise $125 million over the next five years through Campaign UMass.

The financial objective – raising $125 million from private sources – will provide crucial funding for several key University initiatives.

The $40 million allocated for faculty support will enable the University to attract and retain the best professors possible.

Another $40 million will fund college–based intitiatives and research. These resources will support programs, research and technology that each college needs to function effectively.

The $30 million being used to fund facilities, such as an engineering building, an addition to the Student Union, a center for the visual arts and several other buildings, will create the proper environment for education.

The library will receive $5 million for acquisitions, facilities and technology to ensure that students have access to vast amounts of information.

Students will receive $10 million for more financial aid and merit scholarships which will keep the doors of UMass open to all students in the upcoming century.

We believe that the success of Campaign UMass will prepare the University of Massachusetts for the 21st century. We hope that this preparation will ready the University for acceptance in the American Association of Universities (AAU), creating a synnergy between the landgrant and AAU models of a university.

Bi all means

Let's talk about bisexuality, shall we?

Or, rather, I'll talk and you listen for now.

Sexuality in general has been on my mind often of late, partly because in college, and especially at UMass, I have been exposed to opinions, lifestyles and theories I had never been aware of before. I'd never thought in depth enough about my own sexuality to even attempt to ascribe a label to it, let alone look at anybody else's. I just assumed everyone was the same — heterosexual.

Well, recently I've come to the opinion that homosexuality is not evil, as my religion would have me believe or that it is not any more unnatural than man flying and that it is not illogical in the context of American culture (I'll explain this later). Here, however, I would like to focus on bisexuality and the particular questions it raises.

Nicole Cournoyer

First of all, as far as Christianity goes, I would think that bisexuality embodied the essence of the Golden Rule. One must look at sexuality not primarily in terms of the sex act, as is our tendency in this shallow, sexist, patriarchal culture to do, but instead in terms of love relationships — emotionally, not physically, based. If a person is capable of loving a member of either sex powerfully enough to want to marry that person, why shouldn't he/she be able to? And why not be able to consummate that marriage?

It seems to me that bisexuals on this higher level of spirituality are closer to fulfilling God's command than anyone else. They have risen above the blockades that humans create between members of the same sex. They are capable, as the Golden Rule commands, of loving everyone, regardless of sex, not just in the form of respect or neighborliness, but at a much deeper level.

Since the Catholic Church does not sanction same–sex marriages, bisexuals are forced to either 1) repress one part of their sexuality, their potential to love and conform to heterosexual ideals, 2) never marry and therefore, never share sexual intimacy with the people they love if those people happen to be members of the same sex, or 3) become alienated from the Church by practicing not only homosexual sex, but also sex outside of marriage because they cannot be married.

My religion aside, let's take a look at the social constructs that not only justify bisexuality, but make it a logical result of our culture, an occurrence that I am surprised does not manifest itself more often.

Men and women are different, right? At least that's what we are not just led but pushed to believe in this society. Men are tough, women are caring; men are big and strong, women are slender and small but firm; men are logical and mathematical, women are romantic and poetic. If gender roles and sex–marking are pounded into us all of our lives so that we believe men and women are separate beings who look, act and think differently, then it seems logical to assume that men relate to men and women relate to women better and more easily than if they crossed those gender lines.

Homosexuality, it seems, is what our culture socializes us for and yet it pushes heterosexuality on us as the norm, the ideal, the only way to be. Is it any wonder that people are confused? To those people who say bisexuals should choose one way or the other, I ask, is it that simple, that black and white to you? I believe that most people fall somewhere along a bisexual continuum, that there are very few, if any, who are purely hetero or homosexual. How can there be in the presence of such conflicting images?

Many Americans, egged on by consumerism, are obsessed with achieving the ideal body, the right "look," the epitome of maleness or femaleness. We are taught to compete with members of the same sex and envy those who are "better" than us in these areas. Therefore, we are always looking at each other, saying, "I wish I has that person's legs or arms or abs or hair or build or slimness or wardrobe, etc." We spend so much time observing members of the same sex and judging our attractiveness in relation to them that every day we are experiencing tendencies toward bisexuality. People who are conscious of their bisexuality simply no longer suppress those tendencies that culture teaches all of us. Perhaps heterosexuals are simply in denial.

I believe that many bisexuals see and desire the best of both societal–divided genders. They don't want a stereotypical male or a stereotypical female. They're looking for a social hermaphrodite, someone who embodies what they find attractive in both "maleness" and "femaleness." If that person happens to be biologically opposite–sexed, then so be it; the bisexual will appear heterosexual to the world. But if the bisexual finds someone who, like him/herself, has risen above society's norms and who happens to be of the same sex, life will not be so easy.

My philosophy is...

The last sentence of this column is false.

When asked the question, "What's our major?" I usually respond with "Journalism and philosophy," because that is what is true. I'm often interrupted with an "Oh, really?" after stating "Journalism," because most people don't assume I am finished with my answer.

But it is with those who also hear "and philosophy" that I am concerned, or more to the point, it is they who caused me to write on this topic. Or, even more specifically, some of that group.

Steven Grant

Now generally, after saying my course of study, I get one of three reactions, and they are as follows:

1. "Oh, really?" This rhetorical response indicates the speaker's curiosity of my education at the University is non– existent — the question was merely something to say to get the conversation going. You all know the routine. Everyone makes fun of that generic question, yet everyone asks it.

2. "Wow, that's an interesting column." Thank you.

3. "What the hell are you going to do with a degree in philosophy?" It's funny — there's usually a look of anger in the person's eyes presumably because while he's on his seventh hour of thermodynamics homework, I'm wondering if I exist.

Their response is the reason I'm not using this space to write on "Beating the System" or something. It's no secret the answer to that non–rhetorical question is "Not much." And that's part of the reason I have a second major. Why they don't attack that one on similar grounds, I'm not sure.

Heck, even the UMass philosophy department — which was recently rated among the world's best by the way — would no doubt reply similarly. They note in the 1996–97 undergraduate catalog that most philosophers teach philosophy.

And "Even with a Ph.D., one's prospects for teaching philosophy in a college or university are likely to be somewhat limited," it says.

But making a career of philosophy is certainly not the only reason to study it (I'm planning on law school), and the fellows on the third floor of Bartlett know this better than anyone. They understand that the study of philosophy can help you in all areas of life, and life itself. Whether you're that thermo–jerk, a doctor, a retailer, or a mom.

Philosophy can "develop your capacities to think and reason well, to deal critically and analytically with the [stuff] central to your chosen profession." It goes on to say that philosophy prepares you for living for and with yourself. I couldn't have said it better.

So, what exactly is philosophy? Perhaps I have waited too long to address that question. Actually, I know I can't tell you exactly what it is, but I will try nonetheless. It is not, as Professor Fred Feldman is quick to point out, the love of wisdom. For one could (as Fred does) give an example of a philosopher who doesn't love philosophy.

The main fields in philosophy include logic, ethics, metaphysics and pistemology (the theory of knowledge). I think the more one reads the works of say, Russell, Aristotle, or Aquinas, the more clearly one can think, write and communicate, and the more one can challenge and amuse one's mind — kind of like my little game with the sandwiching, paradoxical sentences which I didn't invent.

I feel everyone should take at least one philosophy class, maybe Intro or something. And don't be intimidated at first, because the course will probably be like one you've never experienced before. You may end up being intellectually stimulated, bored, or finding yourself in a discussion of the existence of square circles or the King of France, or God.

Just beware of the guy in class who'll challenge every last philosophical idea presented or the one who holds up the whole class talking "intellectual" jargon getting back a C\D on his midterm. But there are a few who actually enlighten the class, making points and improving the education of some.

Hey, I understand it's not for everyone. But you don't have to be a genius or a workaholic to do well or enjoy philosophy. I know I'm certainly neither.

The first sentence of this column is true.

Life's quirky twists

Michael Charles Mediros

The world does go off on tangents, and it is one of the pleas of life to follow it along. The sights and sounds, tastes, smells and touches, when planned out to perfection and held to with rigid zeal, can too quickly soon become stale. It is the whirl of the unplanned that keeps even the best known corner serendipitous and bloody.

I was watching the Weld–Kerry debate at the Hu Ke Lau restaurant in Chicopee. Weld was due to make a campaign stump there after his bout with Kerry. When the debate ended I wandered outside, hoping to pin myself a good spot to snap a picture of Weld as he came in. I got to talking with a few people, met a couple of guys who looked like they were dragged in off the set of Goodfellas, –learned that it was a shrewd investment to buy Springfield real estate, and then, extricating myself from that pipe smoke–stained conversation, ran into Marian Phillips.

I don't remember exactly what started us talking, but I realize now that a camera is about as good a key to the box that holds a person's memory as anything. It turns out Marian's husband was a photographer, as well as her daughter. Another turn of the screw and I find out that her husband was in the military, stationed throughout the world, but most notably for our conversation, in the southern part of our United States. The south she described was, for a black man, a curse and the army a malicious hell.

Marian's husband died the year before J.F.K. was killed, high blood pressure finally bursting him. After the funeral she was flooded with stories about him, from all over the world. There was a whole other side to the man which he had kept hidden from her.

He had, throughout his life, been bringing black men from the south, teaching them to read and write, finding them jobs, the most menial type sometimes, but jobs that brought them from the south to the north. In the south, he said, a black man was a dog, but in the north at least he was a man.

It was around that time that Weld showed, and we tried unsuccessfully to get a picture of her and Weld together. We did get one on his way out. Lucky for us that trained politician turned on a dime for a publicity shot plea. Between Weld's entrance and exit, though, Marian told me something else, one of those flips of conversation that make a person snap to attention. It turns out she was an acquaintance of Malcolm X.

She bought a house down the Cape from the guy for $300, a house which she said Malcolm had swindled from some Cape Verdeans for a hundred and at which he and his wife Ellen had held clambakes.

We got into a long story about those parties and she told me that she neither respected nor liked Malcolm. He was slick, she thought, sleazy. She did not like Minister Louis Farrakhan either. It was good, she admitted, that Farrakhan was trying to instill pride in black men, but she believed humans should not have to be told to have pride in themselves. It was something they should just have. She is a very smart lady and I hope the picture I took of her and Weld comes out nicely. It would be a small payback for a very good night of talk.

The caprice of it all. I went to this rally figuring that I would learn a little about politics, maybe meet and talk Gingrich revolution with some Republican women from Smith or Mount Holyoke and generally gorge myself on a buffet. It turns out I barely heard the debate, spoke possibly 10 sentences to the women, received a nasty cold shoulder from one Smithie and gorged myself on the buffet and got one heck of a kick out of life when I needed it badly.

I love the twists that change a day. The living world is not a stable planned thing, and if you let yourself sway with it, just a bit, every few minutes, you might stumble into a better setting. I'll take life, God, as long as it keeps churning out Marian Phillipses and never makes one alike. Pray chance it never stops.

Clean up your mess!

To the editor:

In recent weeks, I have noticed the increased amount of horse dung on campus. As I don't see any equestrians riding on campus, I am left to conclude, and rightfully so, that the police department, in all its splendor, through its mounted police units has been defecating without remorse on our campus. In today's University, where buzz words among administrators are "campus beautification" and others implying the same, I find it particularly annoying that such a phenomenon is allowed to occur. Dog owners are encouraged if not forced to clean up their dogs' excrement. Why not the police department? I am even embarrassed to be talking of something so minimal when today's society is plagued with other, more severe issues, but I cannot resist. Chief... Clean up your act.

Collegian needs hard news

To the editor:

I am a new student at UMass, but in the past six weeks, the Collegian has easily climbed to the top of my list of annoyances. The past three weeks, I have sat and read their pitiful news coverage accompanied with extremist commentary that attacked not only Israeli actions, but the very right of Israel to exist. Then, last Thursday I read one of their staff members lecture his simplistic solution to Jews and Arabs: stop hating and start talking. This column especially made me aware of the Collegian's hypocrisy. The Collegian attempts to show that it gives an equal stage for the polarized views of this conflict, when it actually embraces one side through bad editorial work.

The Collegian has at some point decided that its limited resources are enough to bridge the gap between being a local university paper and an international news provider, but the Collegian must still adhere to basic tenets of journalism. If a paper is to provide world news, it usually sends a reporter to the target location. Since I have yet to hear of a Collegian Middle East correspondent, it should at least quote or reproduce articles published in respectable papers that do. For example, The New York Times had published an average of two pages per day regarding the latest Israeli–Palestinian clashes, and had done a fairly thorough and balanced job. The Collegian on the other hand allows "news" to be transferred directly from their columnists imagination and second–hand perception of the events into fiery diatribes. The Collegian editors should have demanded quotes and facts from reliable forces; I feel they have failed in their job of overseeing their writers' work. Let me remind you that when a paper claims objectivity it should also be accountable for the validity of what it has published. For example, Collegian writers claim 80 Palestinians died (a number obtained by grafting 17 dead Israelis to 54 dead Palestinians), and the "Zionists" (i.e. Israel) were ruining the foundations of Temple Mount (please check New York Times denouncement of this farce). The Collegian appears to be a soap box for promoting anti–Israeli propaganda.

The Collegian did republish an article from an international press agency, however it was that of a Palestinian source. For the sake of balanced delivery of the events, an Israeli source should have been granted equal exposure.

When the Collegian grants indiscriminate coverage to anti– Israeli propaganda, but then limits responses to 450 word opinion columns, it is not maintaining neutral balance. Due to the low journalistic quality of these articles they should not have been published under the pretense of "news," but as opinion columns, equally limited in size and side by side with contradicting opinions. In conclusion, I call for the editors to embrace their responsibility and put an end to the biased, low–quality propaganda shrouded as news and facts. People have the right to their personal opinions, but these alleged news reports should be clearly labeled as such, the sole opinion of their writers.

Political trends affect election

To the editor:

Two recent trends in American politics are operating to make the Kerry–Weld race one of the most closely observed political events in the country. First, the assault on idealism, and its descendent, liberalism. Ronald Reagan, the Pentagon's greatest friend, yet in populist garb, shifted the political debate far to the right. Liberal underpinnings of the social contract — support for the needy, the rights of workers and the importance of government funding to redress inequality and improve the quality of life — were identified as undermining America's strength. "Welfare Moms" (whoever they were,) faceless bureaucrats and closet McGovernites everywhere from the Capitol to the classroom became the scapegoats. Thus, the implication that it is somehow un–American to be liberal continues to percolate in the collective unconscious, although with less virulence than 10 years ago. As a liberal, Kerry must remind voters that such labels, besides being simplistic, say very little about a person's integrity or commitment to the commonwealth.

Second and relatedly, "hot button" issues — crime, taxes, welfare — can be readily seized upon (see Weld campaign) to address voters' fears while grossly oversimplifying the complexity of the issues. To wit: Everyone wants safer streets but who wants to confront the root causes like the glut of high school dropouts, the decline of the family and the shortage of good paying jobs for blue collar trades in industry? Tax cuts sound swell. Sure, you want to starve a bureaucrat but what about the clean parks, well–staffed schools and accessible libraries and museums that tax dollars provide? Welfare? Cut the rolls? Yeah, but the much maligned "culture of dependency" isn't going to evaporate this year. To make welfare as we know it obsolete — seemingly every pols' pledge — is to pour money into day care, job training and education. To date, I sense the Weld campaign has been more effective in claiming to address these issues yet offering little substance.

Overall, and as usual, the voter had a choice between ideas and policies which sound good and identify scapegoats (criminals, deadbeats and welfare queens) and more sobering truths: to raise up communities, monies must be invested wisely in all its people. I believe only the latter course will produce real improvement. And its hard to explain in a 'sound bite' or a 30–second ad on TV. And even harder to enact; but when has real change been easy?

Mephiskapheles dishes up ska at Pearl Street

Noho gets taste of satanic ska

By Sandi Okun
Collegian Correspondent

Tonight Pearl Street hosts one of the hottest "neo–ska revival" bands around today, Mephiskapheles. Opening up for them are Thumper, Blue Meanies and the Mugwama.

A Mephiskapheles show is somewhat like a pagan ritual — the band is known to represent "satanic ska for the whole family." Sweating skankers are forever moving to the sounds of Jamaican ska, jazz, thrash and punk. The band's most familiar tunes are "Danse Me Not," "Doomsday," "Lucky 666" and "Saba."

Their rendition of "The Bumble Bee Tuna Song" is fabulous and known by all. "Saba" seems to be their most popular song with kids singing and chanting along.

This NYC band gained popularity performing at such clubs as The Limelight, Wetlands and Tramps. Their humorous lyrics which represent complete satanic verses are not meant to be taken literally. The power of their music lies within the instruments.

On saxophone is Alex McCabe, who has recorded and worked with such legends as Natalie Cole and Ray Charles. Greg Robinson on trombone has been playing in rock bands since he was 11 and currently writes for Jazz Times Magazine. On trumpet resides Osho Endo, who has worked with Frankie Valli and is a graduate of the Manhattan School of Music.

Norman brings his deviations to UMass

By Anna Feder
Collegian Staff

Self–identified, costumed activist storyteller Norman B is bringing his brand of political satire to the University of Massachusetts tonight. Norman began crafting his performance, dubbed "Deviations from the Norm" as a street poet in Ybor City — Tampa's artistic district in the early '80s. Though he has remained underground, he has been recognized in nearly every state.

Since then he has performed at 50 hemp rallies nationwide, including the Extravaganja festival in Amherst. He was also sought and auditioned by the "David Letterman Show" in 1993. His resume includes opening for the seminal psychedelic rockers, Iron Butterfly. His work was even praised by Grateful Dead founder, the late Jerry Garcia.

Norman came to this area a year and a half ago to seek his fame and fortune in the "Happy Valley." He has performed for open–mike at Claudia's Cafe and more recently at the Fire and Water in Northampton. He has even performed in classes on campus.

His one–man show, comprised of leftist politics and comic alternative theater is presented to the audience visually in the burlap costume he wears. The immense hood drapes over his gray hair but allows his shaggy beard to project out. It all contributes to his appearance as a "long haired criminal– looking dude" which he recognizes in one of his songs. He uses other props such as a walking stick and hand puppet to illustrate his messages.

Norman B will be performing in the Butterfield lounge at 8 p.m. There is no cost and participants are encouraged to bring their drums for a drum circle following the show.

Combustible Edison shakes up Ironhorse

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Correspondent

COURTESY SUB POP RECORDS

Combustible Edison

To serve a truly spectacular musical cocktail, combine two parts spacey melodica, one part lounge, two parts jazz, one part Latin–bossa nova beat, three parts elevator electronique, two parts schwank and one part jungle and ambient domestically–suburban pop.

Shake lightly. Ignite. Serve.

Cocktail hour starts this evening at 7 p.m. as Combustible Edison swings into Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall.

This unique sound could only be brought to you by a singular group of people, namely: Miss Lily Banquette (vocalist, drums, percussion, and much more), Nicholas Cudahy (upright bass), Prof. Peter Dixon (keyboards), The Millionaire (guitar) and Aaron Oppenheimer (vibraphone and drums).

Formed in Rhode Island in 1991, the band was originally named the "Combustible Edison Heliotropic Oriental Mambo and Foxtrot Orchestra," performing for The Millionaire's floorshow extravaganza, "The Tiki Wonder Hour."

Since then, the band has toured extensively, both on their own and opening for Bryan Ferry. They have appeared on NBC's "Late Night With Conan O'Brien" and USA's "Up All Night." Their music has been heard in everything from major motion pictures (Quentin Tarantino's Four Rooms) to commercials for OK Soda, major league baseball and the NPR News.

Combustible Edison has released two albums on SubPop: I, Swinger (1994) and Schizophonic (Feb 1996). They describe their own unique sound as a "melody mysterioso from beyond the veil of earthly experience savage and sensuous rhythms, a soigne and sophisticated sensibility."

Their following has embraced the title of the Cocktail Nation. They appreciate ComEd's ability to amalgamate and synthesize various forms of past pop and the Sunday–easy style evoked by such notables as Ray Connick Jr., Burt Bacharach and Lionel Richie.

Combustible Edison puts on fabulous live shows, and tonight's set will surely be entertaining.

So pull on your evening gowns and leisure suits and swing on over to the Iron Horse this evening for a "comically opulent musical intoxication."

Combustible Edison performs at the Iron Horse Music Hall tonight at 7 p.m. Tickets are $10. Call the club at 584–0610 for more information.

Cub brings mix of pop and punk to Hampshire

By Tabi Cagan
Collegian Correspondent

Indie music fans take notice — the collision of cuddlecore and punk will occur tonight when cub takes the stage as part of Hampshire College's annual Halloween event.

With their first two full–lengths, cub charmed both pop fans and college radio DJs with jangly guitars and light– hearted lyrics. Though long–known for this ability to pen sugar–sweet pop songs, cub has recently developed a slightly harder edge, evident on their latest LP, Box of Hair.

On 1993's Betti–Cola, cub embraced the term "cuddlecore" with open arms and 25 cheerfully bouncy tracks. The follow–up, come out, come out, consisted of 12 more catchy songs, including a cover of the Go–Go's "Vacation." While these albums confirmed cub's status as queens of the two– minute pop song, listeners were left wondering if cub was capable of much else.

Now armed with a batch of new and diverse tunes from Box of Hair, members Lisa Marr (vocals, bass), Robynn Iwata (guitar, vocals) and Lisa G. (drums, vocals) are attempting to prove that they have outgrown the cute stage.

Though cub's past releases were on Mint Records, Box of Hair marks the first co–release between Mint and Lookout! Records — best–known for punk–pop bands like Green Day, The Mr. T. Experience and the Queers.

While cub's previous releases would have been out of place

Short cuts to looking fabulous

By Lauren Lobik
Collegian Staff

Think about this scenario — it's Friday and everyone's heading out for a night on the town. The hippest and latest style ensemble is laid out on the bed, but it doesn't look right. What's missing? Not the jewelry or the shoes, but the hair–do. Not only do clothes change over time, but so do hair styles. This may be the precise reason why the pantsuit and square–tip shoes don't look right. The way to solve this miss–match is to go short. Cut it off. Cut it all off.

Men and women can be seen sporting these new short 'dos everywhere from television programs and magazines to runways. This week's TV Guide displays a few celebrities that have started off this fall's television season with a lot less hair. To name a few, Lea Thompson of "Caroline in the City," Candice Bergen of "Murphy Brown" and George Clooney of "ER." Even high fashion models are taking to the short look, among them Cover Girl Nikki Taylor and Revlon model Halle Berry.

What exactly do the new styles look like? The 'dos for women come in many varieties. Thompson sports one very popular style — short layers all around the head with longer ones left at the base of the neck. Bergen wears the same basic style, except her layers are longer on the top of her head and shorter at the neck. Berry's cut goes to much shorter lengths. The sides and back of the head are practically shaved with the length on the top slightly longer.

As for the men, the shorter the better. Everyone knows what Clooney's hair looks like — cut in very short layers all over the head. Then gel is applied to push it forward, creating a matted look. African–American men are the trend setters when it comes shaving heads. Many of the models in Ebony Man sport no hair at all and look great doing it.

There are an abundance of salons in the Amherst, Hadley and Northampton areas. Those that come with the most recommendations are Hair East, Jungle Red and Bucci, all of which are located in Amherst. Yet another one highly recommended is the Styling Salon at JC Penny.

Still not sure if short hair is the way to go? Some salons have computer programs that allow customers to see what they would look like with a new style even before one strand of hair is trimmed. Check the yellow pages for establishments that may have this new software.

Short hair is definitely the icing on the cake when it comes to today's retro looks. One important hint to remember: if going in this direction, a picture is worth a thousand words. Don't enter blindly into a decision so important. Just because you know what you want doesn't mean the hair dresser does.

■ Cub

among such bands, Box of Hair fits right in. Starting out with a burst of raw guitar and rarely letting up, it is a non–stop romp of three–chord melodic punk. Could this be the beginning if a new genre? Cuddlepunk?

Through the Tiger Trap–esque "Main and Broadway" harkens back to cub's younger days, songs like "S.G." and "Box of Hair" add a darker tone. And if the album's live track, "Not What You think," is an example of cub's performance, audience members should bring ear–plugs.

Cub plays tonight at the Hampshire College Dining Commons. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. Call 586–8209 for more info.

Essential albums

to own for all new hardcore fans

There seems to be a disturbing trend of today's hardcore — kids not knowing the roots of the scene. While I admit that progression is both necessary and healthy, what's the point if one doesn't know the roots?

In this week's column, I list the five best hardcore albums of all time, in my not so humble opinion. If you are just getting into the scene, these are the five essential albums you need to have.

1. BAD BRAINS — ROIR Sessions (ROIR)

Okay New Jacks, listen up. These guys were the best — hands down, no questions asked. The Bad Brains started in the late '70s and simply played faster, louder and harder then anyone had ever before. Combining jazz, reggae and Rastafarian beliefs, with a frenetic buzzsaw sound — they simply destroyed everything in their path. Songs like "Sailin' On," "Banned In D.C," "Attitude," "F.V.K." and "Pay To Cum" have been covered countless times and with good reason. No hardcore kid should be without this album. And for all you breakdown lovers, the one in "Supertouch" may be the best ever.

2. CRO–MAGS — Age Of Quarrel — (Profile re–issue) When this album came out in 1986 no one knew what hit them. The Cro–Mags were mean, scary, tough and the hardest band around. Not only did they influence just about every hardcore band today, they were also one of the first to bring Krishna Consciousness into the scene. Songs like "We Gotta Know," "Show You Lo Mercy," "Street Justice" and "Hard Times" will forever remain timeless classics.

3. MINOR THREAT — Discography — (Dischord) Minor Threat will always be remembered as the band that started the SXE movement. (We all know that the Faith were the first SXE band, right?) Nothing will ever really match the intensity of Ian MacKaye screaming, "What happened to you?" on "Filler." While their music may not have been innovative, their concepts of believing in oneself, restraint and positive thinking had a major impact on the hardcore scene. Just listen to songs like "I Don't Wanna Hear It," "Seeing Red," "Screaming At A Wall" and "In My Eyes" to hear what it's all about. While Minor Threat may have lacked in production and ability, they made up for with heart.

4. BLACK FLAG — Damaged (SST)

After moving to the west coast, Henry Rollins joined this already functional band and pushed them to the forefront of the hardcore scene. While one could argue some of Black Flag's other albums like My War were just as good and that the band never captured the true sound of their live shows, Black Flag exemplified a rage that kids who had nothing to do felt. Songs like "Rise Above," "Six Pack," "TV Party," "Police Story" and "Gimmie, Gimmie, Gimmie" were the perfect soundtrack for kids that didn't want to conform to the norms of our world.

5. AGNOSTIC WORLD — Victim In Pain

Although they were one of the most controversial bands ever, no one can deny the impact they had on the scene. Coming from a working class background, their skinhead influenced lyrics led to great controversy. However their calls for unity, fighting the opposition and standing up for yourself served as a blatant middle finger to popular culture. They may have summed up the scene the best when they sang, "There's no justice, there's just us."

Colorful foliage highlights trails

Out through the fields and the woods and over the walls I have wended;
I have climbed the hills of view and looked at the world, and descended...

— Robert Frost

Slowly Mother Nature is draining the Pioneer Valley of its vibrant colors as she shakes and rattles her trees with pounding rain and strong winds. Hike the Leverett Knobs and Mount Toby before the full figure trees of autumn turn into winter's grey skeletons.

The rambling Robert Frost Trail travels over the Leverett Knobs from Juggler Meadow Road to Bull Hill Road. Just off Route 63, the trail starts on the westside of the CV Railway bridge, off Juggler Meadow Road.

Covering 1.89 miles, this meandering hike winds over a group of rocky knolls between Juggler Meadow Road and Depot Road, then follows country roads to the beginning of Mount Toby.

The trail's starting elevation is 315 feet and climbs up to 471 feet through open woods. From Juggler Meadow Road, the trail leads north along a brook and gradually ascends a wooded hill, before dropping to cross a railroad track. The trail continues through dry woods that have suffered noticeably from the gypsy moth spell of the early '80s. When the trail reaches Depot Road, it turns left and continues west until Route 63. From Route 63, it travels to a brook on Bull Hill Road that crosses the Leverett– Sunderland town line.

The Mount Toby section of the trail begins on the right just past the brook. From this point the Robert Frost Trail travels up a steep easterly ridge. The trail climbs over three high points — North Summit Bull Hill at 827 feet, Bull Hill at 937 feet and Mount Toby Summit at 1269 feet.

Incredible views are available along these high elevations and Mount Toby's fire tower. After a steep climb, the trail follows a roller coaster route, descending to Cranberry Pond and Reservation Road in Sunderland.

Completed in 1987 by the Summer Amherst Regional High School Conservation Crew, this section is the most recent addition to the Robert Frost Trail, supported by a grant from the Department of Environmental Management.

The Leverett Knobs and Mount Toby provide great picnic sites and excellent exercise. However, both of these recreation areas have large sections of private property. It is important to abide by all of the trail markers and only hike in designated areas.

Climb the hills of Leverett and catch autumn's lively leaves before they fly away.

■ Mephiskapheles

Singing is Andre Worrell and on drums is Wayne Dunton. Tattoo artist Brian Martin plays keyboard and Brendan Tween, the guitarist, has been with the hardcore scene since the '80s — playing with The Shaved Pigs and co–founder of Mephiskapheles. Bassist Victor Rice has played with The Toasters, The Stubborn All–Stars and has produced music of The Scofflaws, The Pie Tasters and The Slackers.

Mephiskapheles' first album, God Bless Satan was produced by Bill Laswell who has worked with The Ramones, PIL and Motorhead. In the past, this satanic mode has been heard through the music of heavy metal, but Mephiskapheles took a different route. They wanted to play music kids could dance to, not just bang their heads incessantly. They felt ska would get the kids moving and it did.

Some listeners have shyed away from the Mephiskapheles satanic scene, but the band insists that denying the evil they express is denying yourself. Not all music is meant to be taken so seriously, so have fun and skank until the lights go on.

Mephiskapheles will be playing at Pearl Street tonight at 7:30 p.m. Call the club at 584–4256 for more info.

ACLU president to speak on Monday

By Daniel E. Levenson
Collegian Staff

Nadine Strossen, President of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) will deliver a lecture entitled "Current Challenges to Civil Liberties: the First Amendment, Pornography and the Internet," at the University of Massachusetts on Monday, Oct. 28, at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

The lecture, which will be free and open to the public, will be presented by the Distinguished Visitor's Program (DVP).

Strossen, who is both the first female and the youngest person to lead the ACLU, will be addressing the topic of censorship on the Internet.

Strossen is a magna cum laude graduate of Harvard Law School and is currently a professor of Constitutional law at New York Law School.

The DVP said, "Strossen was born for the job. Aggressive but compassionate, focused but laid–back, refined but street smart, she has a passion for the Bill of Rights and a knack for getting that document's finer points across in an easily understandable manner."

The DVP, which has brought speakers including Allen Ginsberg, Kurt Vonnegut and Ralph Nader to campus in the past, is run and financially supported by undergraduate students.

Strossen has appeared on many television shows, including "Crossfire," "Larry King Live," "CBS Sunday Morning with Charles Kuralt," "Sonya Live" and the "Today Show."

She has been published in a variety of publications such as the Duke Law Journal, Cornell Law Review, Ohio State University Law Review and the Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy.

In addition to her evening presentation, Strossen will also be conducting a question and answer session for a legal studies class at the University earlier in the day.

Police mourn airplane crash victims

LOWELL, Mass. (AP) — A color guard and a lone bagpiper led more than 1,500 mourners yesterday as they paid respects to five police officers killed in a plane crash last weekend.

Four active police officers, three from Lowell and one from North Reading, and a retired Lowell officer were among eight killed Sunday when their twin–engine plane crashed in New Brunswick, Canada. The eight were returning from an annual elk hunting trip.

"We lost four good guys," said one Lowell officer. "Words can't describe how I feel."

The Lowell officers killed in the crash were Lt. Steven Smith, 40; Officer Donald Brill, 41; and Officer David Seamans, 47. North Reading Officer Robert Marchionda, 39, and former Lowell and Westford Sgt. John F. Sullivan, 65, also were killed. Seamans and Marchionda were canine officers. Police dogs from around the state sat at attention as the mourners filed by.

Brill was a mounted officer. A half–dozen horses, their officers, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police also were there to pay their respects. A lone helicopter flew overhead.

The service was held in the Lowell Memorial Auditorium. The officers' caskets were placed in separate sections of the hall, with each casket draped in an American flag, the officers' caps and their white dress gloves. The caskets were surrounded by photos of the officers and their families.

Police from around New England were among the mourners. Others socialized with the officers, knew them as customers or just appreciated their service to their communities.

"It's always the good guys who die," said Donald Galloway, 39, of Lowell, who knew Seamans from his electrical supply business.

Funerals for the five officers will be held Friday and Saturday.

available for comment.

The shooting that sparked the violence happened after two officers stopped a car with two people inside about 5:30 p.m., Tampa television station WTVT reported. The car lurched forward, hitting one of the officers, and the officers opened fire, striking the driver of the car, the station reported.

The man died before reaching Bayfront Medical Center, a hospital spokesman said. He was not identified.

Hundreds of people in the neighborhood began shouting at the police, and the violence quickly escalated.

The crowd throwing bricks attacked the WTOG news truck while a cameraman was inside, said Susan Wilson, the television station's assignment editor.

A car belonging to one of the television station's reporters was also set on fire, she said. The cameraman was struck by glass but was able to run away.

"I crouched down. I put my camera on top of my head to avoid cinder blocks coming down and hitting me," cameraman David DeJohn said. "I thought I was going to get killed."

Men's basketball coach Flint signs contract

Bruiser guaranteed $1.4 million in four–year deal

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's basketball coach James "Bruiser" Flint signed a contract Wednesday that assures him of that position for four years, Athletic Director Bob Marcum announced later that day.

Flint was announced as the coach of the Minutemen on June 8 and has had an agreement in principle with the school since then, but did not have a final contract worked out until Wednesday when the four–year, minimum $1.4 million package was announced.

"I know there are a lot of people who will look at this contract as a lot of money for an inexperienced coach, but we look at him as an experienced coach," Marcum said. "He has been with us seven years, we have played big games and he played a major role in those games as well as the practice for them."

In addition his base pay of $132,060, which will be paid with tax dollars, Flint will receive $85,000 from the athletic department's deal with Nike.

Like his predecessor John Calipari, he will also receive an annual bonus equal to 80 percent of the school's gross proceeds from one road game, not to exceed $25,000 or come from either the Boston College or Connecticut games.

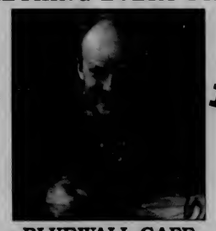
The contract also includes compensation for appearances on radio and television coaches' shows which the athletic department retains the rights to.

He will receive $25,000 for spots on WHMP radio's coach's show and 50 percent of the gross revenues for appearances on television coaches' shows. Like last year, this year's TV show will be produced by WGGB Channel 40 in Springfield.

The deal also allows Flint to enter into other endorsement deals, with the approval of the Chancellor and the Athletic Director. A clause of this sort is standard practice in the coaching profession.

There is a also clause which states Flint or his new employer must pay the University $125,000 within 30 days of termination, should he decide to leave the school before his contract expires. Calipari before him had to only give the school a 30–day notice.

Flint's deal does not include the revenue generated by the UMass summer basketball camp, of which Flint will give the school six percent.



Flint was pleased with his contract.

"As I've said before, there is nowhere I would rather be coaching than here in Amherst," he said. "It's a relief to get the final details out of the way, so I can devote my full attention to getting the team ready."

end."

Shimagki agreed.

"To be honest, I guess I really haven't had any feelings about these last games at home," Shimogaki said. "It's more of like I don't want this season to end. In not a bad way, but it has not been as good as I hoped for. I hope we play well the rest of the way, and get some wins in Texas [A&M Tournament next week]."

Both players have seen both sides of the game for the Minutewomen, from first year cheerleading to senior year leadership. A sense of history creeps into their thoughts on this last regular season homestand, and they both want to go out on top.

"Hopefully, we need to just play well this weekend in preparation for next week in Texas, or this will be our last four games," Shimogaki said. "It is the first time in my four years that we have not been ranked in the top 20. For me, it's more of an inspiration to wind this next week up better than last week, because we are better than that."

"This year has been a great year. It's been great playing at home, our crowds have given us a lot of support," Lightning said. "Unfortunately, these will probably be the last couple of games on Garber Field for good, because of the new stadium that is being built, and it's a shame that a tradition like that will be taken away from the soccer team.

"We are going to go out this weekend and give the crowd what they want by winning both games."

the final regular season home appearance for the team's seniors. Leading scorer Siljanovsi along with Dan Chagnon, Tashi Tshering, and Lee Marlow will take to Richard F. Garber Field for the final time this season.

However, Koch feels his players will have other things on their minds than mere sentimentality.

"I don't think they are too concerned about it being their last [home game]. They just want to win and go on to the post-season."

Injury Report: Junior offensive lineman Ron Felice should be back in action this weekend after missing the last couple with a sprained MCL in his left knee. Junior defensive end Chris Cronin is probable in returning this week as well after missing the last five games with a torn flexor tendon in his left hand. Senior free safety Brian Mooney and wide receiver Darryl Thomas are still out and are expected to apply for a medical reshirt year.

Pettite's pitching key as NY wins no. 5; Braves on brink as Yankees near title

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

ATLANTA — The New York Yankees might miss this ballpark even more than the Atlanta Braves.

Andy Pettitte outpitched John Smoltz in a classic duel, and the Yankees moved within one win of the World Series championship by banging out a 1-0 victory over Atlanta in Game 5 last night.

In the last game ever to be played at Atlanta-Fulton County Stadium, the Yankees finished this postseason 8-0 on the road. They got the 3-2 Series lead by working around a leadoff double in the ninth inning by Chipper Jones.

Pettitte got one out and John Wetteland got the last two, the final one a fly ball that gimpy right fielder Paul O'Neill caught on the move with runners at first and third.

Now, they'll return to Yankee Stadium — where they're just 2-4 this October — with a chance to clinch their record 23rd title and dethrone the defending champions.

"I've been telling everyone I don't know if we get too pumped up playing at home," Pettitte said. "We may need to bring it down a notch and just play our game."

Game 6 will be tomorrow night, with Jimmy Key starting for New York against Greg Maddux.

The final game at this park turned out to be anything except the kind of slugfest that earned this place its reputation as The Launching Pad. Instead, the House that Hank Built — Hank Aaron that is — went out with a whimper, with a total of only nine hits and the lone run scoring as a result of an error.

"It's a game of inches," Braves manager Bobby Cox said. "The breaks have not gone our way."

Yankees manager Joe Torre was glad to take it, though. He hit the first regular-season home run at the stadium in 1966 and was back for his greatest win in the majors.

Pettitte shut out the Braves on four hits through the first eight innings, and also helped himself by throwing to third for a forceout in a key spot in the sixth. It was a far cry from his effort in the 12-1 Game 1 loss when he allowed seven runs in 2 1-3 innings.

Smoltz fell to 9-2 lifetime in the postseason despite not giving up an earned run. A miscommunication in the outfield caused a two-base error on center fielder Marquis Grissom in the fourth and set up an RBI double by Cecil Fielder. Smoltz struck out 10 in eight innings and permitted four hits, three by Fielder.

Jones opened the ninth with a double and moved to third when Fred McGriff grounded out to the right side. Wetteland relieved and Javy Lopez grounded out to drawn-in third baseman Charlie Hayes, keeping Jones at third. After pinch-hitter Ryan Klesko was intentionally walked, pinch-hitter Luis Polonia pulled a fly ball that O'Neill caught in the alley. Wetteland earned a save for the third straight day and set Atlanta to its first 1-0 loss at home this season.

This was the 23rd 1-0 game in Series history, with the Braves winning the previous one last October in Game 6 to clinch its first World Series title over Cleveland.

The road team has won all five games in the Series. The only other time that happened was 1906 when the Cubs and White Sox played in Chicago.

Hayes opened the fourth with a fly ball into the alley in right-center. Grissom, showing the range that won him his fourth Gold Glove earlier this month, was on the run and calling for it when Jermaine Dye drifted over from right.

Dye cut a few feet in front of Grissom and clearly distracted him, and the ball popped out of Grissom's impromptu try at a basket catch and fell to the ground.

Hayes reached second on the error, moved up on Bernie Williams' grounder and scored on Fielder's hard double into the left-field corner.

Pettitte held the Braves hitless until Andruw Jones — who homered off him in Game 1 — singled to start the fifth. But Pettitte, who led the majors in pickoffs this season with 11, detected that the rookie was ready to run and trapped him off first.

The Braves' biggest threat came in the sixth when Smoltz, a .218 hitter this season, and Grissom began the inning by grounding singles to left field. Mark Lemke, who popped up a bunt attempt in a similar situation in Game 3, tried to sacrifice again.

Pettitte, however, helped himself by springing off the mound, barehanding the ball and throwing to third for a forceout. Pettitte handled the next ball, too, starting an inning-ending double play on Chipper Jones' comebacker.

After Jim Leyritz led off the Yankees seventh with a walk and stole second when Atlanta failed to cover the bag, Torre asked Pettitte to sacrifice.

Pettitte, who popped up a bunt in the fifth, managed to put a bunt in play, although Smoltz sprung off the mound and caught Leyritz in a rundown.

Pettitte reached safely on the play, and first base coach Jose Cardenal went so far as to walk onto the field and draw a line in the dirt with his spikes, showing the pitcher how far to take a lead.

The advice did not help, though, when Derek Jeter hit a line drive directly at first baseman McGriff. Pettitte was only a few steps off the bag, but knew he was doomed and he merely doubled over while McGriff doubled him off.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

Intellectual pursuits prove rewarding. Be certain that you do not neglect material concerns if you get caught up in the thrill of the chase. Concentrate your energies on a specific goal.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

A social gathering is hectic but fun. Sneak off to a quiet corner if you start to suffer sensory overload. A favorable business deal could result from your patience and common sense. Pay close attention to your health this week.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Impulse buying could prove problematic today. Ask for a few days to consider all the angles, or ask a trusted friend for advice. Romence looks promising—but don't make any promises you can't keep.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

An out-of-town adventure could turn out to be more than you can handle. Keep the gas tank full and check the tires and oil before you leave. An ounce of prevention is worth much more than a pound of cure.

LEO
July 23–August 23

Watch for a great investment opportunity coming your way—then check it out thoroughly. You can't go wrong by getting a second opinion. If it seems too good to be true, it probably is.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

Fulfill past promises to clear the slate for an exciting event. Your productivity and single-mindedness could bring a project back on track—if you use tact and don't offend a key member of your team.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

Now is a good time to spend some "quality time" with a friend or loved one. A chance encounter leads to some surprising developments. Go with the flow, but keep your eyes and ears open as well.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

Stay within your sphere of expertise this week. Someone may ask for your opinion on an unfamiliar subject. Resist the temptation to show off—it could backfire and cause irreparable repercussions.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

Treat yourself to a small luxury to improve your mood throughout the week. Words can have a powerful influence—are you choosing yours carefully? Consider alternate possibilities.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

An enticing opportunity deserves a second look. It could be just the thing to change your outlook. Don't let fear of the unknown govern your decison. This is a good week to focus on developing your personal resources.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

Physical activity helps you banish the post-holiday blues. It doesn't have to be strenuous to be healthy. Invite someone you haven't seen recently over for an evening of conversation. This too can help boost you out of those doldrums.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Someone whom you think is all wet could be on the right track. Listen carefully to see if you could be missing the point. A complicated difficulty resolves itself easily. Now is a good time to concentrate on your own needs.

My mother was sitting at the kitchen table crying. She says she's on vacation all next week but she's so broke she can't afford to leave the house. She says her job is making her poor.

Mom shuts off the lights around the house, and she uses as little soap as possible to wash things. At the supermarket she's not relaxed... she's serious.

She started to cry again when I told her I love her.

I said, "Mom we're not poor. We're too broke to be poor. We'd need another $50 bucks a week to be poor... We're free."

She said, "Yeah... free to be poor." I was confused but I felt much better. She has a way with words.

Seniors hoping for women's soccer success

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

In Walt Whitman's masterpiece, Leaves Of Grass, the poet centers around his declaration of singing "a song of myself."

For this year's senior class of the Massachusetts women's soccer team (11-2-1, 4-0-1 in Atlantic 10), the poetic declaration could be more like "a song of ourselves."

This weekend, the class of 1997 might be playing their final games on the leaves of grass that is Richard F. Garber Field, as the Minutewomen will face off against Temple (3- 12, 2-5 in A-10) on Saturday at 1 p.m. and Duquesne (5-5- 3, 1-4-1 in A-10) on Sunday at 2 p.m. These will be the final two games in UMass' daunting 1996 conference schedule before the A-10 Championships, which will be held at the University of Rhode Island, start two weeks from today.

An NCAA bid is still up in the air, and a post-season home game will be the only other opportunity for this class of Minutewomen to go out with style at home. So, this weekend could possibly be the swan song for one of the top senior classes in recent UMass sports history: midfielder Tina Lightning, defender Erin Lynch, midfielders Julie Magid, Rebecca Myers (out for season with knee injury), Amy Powell and Sandy Shimogaki.

Over the past four years, together they have helped lead the Minutewomen to a combined 58-15-6 record, three NCAA appearances, with a Final Four showing in 1993, and only one loss ever in the Atlantic Ten. That loss was to Temple on the road last season, as the Owls stormed out of their barn. Keeping eight players back in the box, that strategy helped lead them to a 1-0 upset.

Last season, Temple ended up with 9-6-2 record, leading them to the best conference record in the Eastern Division. This season, a 3-12 record does not say much for them, but UMass coach Jim Rudy will still not take their in-your-face style for granted.

For two of this year's seniors, Lightning and Shimogaki, they see different reasons for inspiration in this possible last weekend at Garber Field.

"It should be a great weekend," Lightning said. "Double- headers are always hard, because you have to get up for both games. They are conference games, and we should come out with two wins at the end of the week-

Hockey set to open against UM–Lowell

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

What a way to open a season.

Unlike last year's road trip down to Army, the Massachusetts hockey team will start its 1996-97 campaign with two of its biggest weekend series of the year, playing a home-and-home set with Boston University next weekend, and a pair with arch rival UMass-Lowell, starting tonight 7 p.m. at Joe Tully Forum in North Billerica.

The brewing rivalry between the two branches of the state university system proved to be one of last year's highlights, with the Minutemen from Amherst taking home the first ever Alumni Cup, given to the winner of the season series.

The River Hawks will get their first chance to take it back tonight, and tomorrow night at the William D. Mullins Center, but are not the same team they were a year ago.

Bruce Crowder, an excellent coach who was the single greatest asset to the program, has left to assume the coaching position at Northeastern. Tim Whitehead, Crowder's top assistant, replaced him at Lowell and will coach his first official contest tonight against a fierce rival.

After graduating strong players like Brendan Concannon, Christian Sbrocca and Jeff Daw, in addition to the loss of its coach, UMass-Lowell will have its work cut out for it if it intends to return to the NCAAs, where the River Hawks came within a victory of the final four last year.

Preseason All-Hockey East goaltender Martin Fillion will have to come up big for this squad, but will not factor in this weekend's action. Fillion has been suspended for the team's first four games for violating a team policy.

Of the three contests between the teams last year, the one at Tully Forum was UMass' strongest, as it busted out of the gates, taking a 5-0 lead, and cruised to a 7-4 win behind a Rob Bonneau hat trick. The Minutemen dropped a flip- flopping 7-5 decision to Lowell in November and came back from a 3-0 deficit to tie Lowell 4-4 and win the shootout, in their two meetings with the River Hawks at the Mullins Center.

Tonight's game is the season opener for both teams, but they have played exhibitions, both facing Concordia University of Montréal. UMass downed the Stingers 6-0, while the River Hawks stung back, beating Concordia 6-2.

An intense weekend of hockey action is certain to await fans in both locales as games the past two years between the teams have been spirited, solid hard-checking affairs. The combination of an opening night and a rival on the opposing bench, should make for some great hockey from both sides.

It's UMass — UNH in YanCon showdown

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

This is where it all begins.

The stretch run for the Massachusetts football team begins tomorrow as the Minutemen take on the Wildcats of New Hampshire at 12:30 p.m. in a Yankee Conference matchup in Durham.

The Wildcats are ranked 18th in Division I-AA, and are one of the three ranked conference opponents UMass will play to finish off the season.

UMass comes into this game with a mark of 5-2, 3-1 in the Yankee Conference, including a 41-20 Homecoming thrashing of the Buffalo Bulls last week. New Hampshire has a mark of 4-2, 2-2 in the Yankee Conference, and last week lost to Maine in Orono 34-20.

The Wildcats took the victory over the Minutemen last year 33-29 in Amherst, but UMass holds a 35-19-3 lead in the all-time series, which dates back to 1897.

Minuteman coach Mike Hodges is happy with the performance of his team and its preparation for games.

"I have no problem with our effort at all, I think our effort has been fantastic and we're playing with emotion," Hodges said. "One of the goals we set for ourselves in preseason was to be mentally and emotionally ready to play every football game, and I think we've done that."

The Minutemen will have a tough task on their hands this weekend though. They hold a slim one game lead over the Wildcats in the YanCon New England Division, and have not won in Durham since 1988. A win would put the Minutemen in excellent position to capture the conference divisional title, a feat that they have not accomplished since the league split into two divisions in 1993.

This season for UMass has seen many different players step up to the challenge and contribute to this year's squad.

Five different running backs for UMass have rushed for over 100 yards in a game this year, and a total of 12 different players have carried the ball for the Minutemen. Fourteen players have scored at least one touchdown, and 12 have a least one reception.

"This is really a fun group to coach because you don't have to worry about motivating them," Hodges said. "We let them set the goals, and they've accepted those goals and they know what it takes to get there. I love being around people that are team orientated, and that want to win, and that is what this group is all about."

Senior fullback Ron Brockington, is the team's leading rusher with 496 yards, three touchdowns on 76 carries and an average of 6.5 yards per carry.

Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith has come on strong each week. This season he has thrown for 442 yards on 30-for-69 passing with four TDs and only one interception.

The defense of the Minutemen has been strong all season as a trio of linebackers in senior Justin Reimer (97 tackles), senior Mike Dawson (79 tackles), and sophomore Khari Samuel (78 tackles) are one, two and three respectively on the team in tackles, and one, three and four respectively in the conference in taking players down.

The Wildcats offense ranks second in the Yankee Conference, racking up 407.8 yards per game, but is last in the league in total defense, giving up 402 yards a game.

Sophomore tailback Jerry Azumah leads the way for UNH as the leading rusher in the conference with 129.2 yards per game and a total of 10 TDs.

Senior quarterback Chris Bresnahan has completed 120 of 197 passes (.609 percent), for 1274 yards, 10 TDs and eight interceptions.

"They're an excellent football team, they run the ball well, they throw the ball well, and they've got very good receivers and we need to play very well defensively and try to control those things," Hodges said. "Offensively we need to take some time off the clock, and score some points and hopefully offset their offense a little bit."

This game will be a battle, featuring several of the top players and statistical leaders in the conference. UMass has controlled penalties effectively, and will look to do the same while eliminating turnovers. If the Minutemen can do that, knocking the Wildcats out of contention while staying at the top of the division is a very strong possibility.

"I think this is a very important game for both teams, but especially for us since we have two conference losses," UNH coach Bill Bowes said. "UMass runs the football well, they have a

It's UMass vs. UConn, this time in field hockey

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team will get the chance to try its hand at the UMass–UConn rivalry this weekend when the Minutewomen travel to Storrs, Conn. to face Connecticut Saturday at noon.

No. 8 UMass stands at 10-4 on the year and sports a perfect Atlantic 10 record of 4-0. With only one conference game remaining, that record guarantees the Minutewomen at least a share of the A-10 regular season title.

But the focus tomorrow shifts to the non-conference Huskies, who have stormed out of the gate this year to a 16- 1 record. The Huskies have also posted a perfect 4-0 mark in the Big East.

UConn leads the all-time series between the two schools, which dates back to 1975, 15-10-2. UMass' last win in the series came in 1993, a game which marked UMass coach Pam Hixon's 250th career victory and the last time Hixon faced the Huskies. Connecticut beat the Minutewomen 2-1 last year in Amherst.

UConn's attack is led by Rose Aspelin, whose 103 total shots are only 15 fewer than teammates Laura Kaczynski (56) and Wendy Brady (62) combined. Aspelin has connected for 26 goals and six assists on the year, to lead the Huskies with 58 points.

Kaczynski is right behind Aspelin in the goals column, notching 24 tallies of her own.

Brady has put more emphasis on the set-up position, assisting on 25 goals while scoring 10. Kendra Kimble has scored six goals and assisted on 14.

Defensively, Tricia Betts should get the call to the Husky net, as she has started in every UConn game this year. She has posted a 0.65 goals against average, making 78 saves and allowing only nine goals.

For the Minutewomen, the offensive threat comes in the form of Kyle Rothenberger and Erica Johnston. Atlantic 10 Player of the Week Rothenberger has tallied nine goals and five assists on the year, including a two-goal performance last weekend against La

Men's soccer post–season hopes riding on weekend

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

For all intents and purposes, the post-season starts today at 3 p.m. for the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

Currently, the Minutemen are stuck between a rock and a hard place, as they are one of four teams tied for third place in the Atlantic 10. Because only four teams will go on to the post season conference tournament, two wins this weekend would provide the boost UMass needs to stay on the field well into November.

Today, the Minutemen host St. Bonaventure, while they will mix it up with Duquesne on Sunday at 1 p.m.

"Both are good, well-coached teams that can beat people," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "They are not in the running as far as the tournament goes, it would be hard for either team to make it. St. Bonaventure has a slight chance, but not likely.

The Bonnies enter the contest with a mark of 6-8-2 (3-5-1 A-10), coming off a 2-1 loss to Temple last weekend. The lone goal was scored by the team's leading scorer David Servello, who leads his side with eight goals and two assists with 18 points.

As for the Dukes, who post a record of 4-6-3 (2-4-2 A- 10), sophomore forward David Kincaid leads the offense with six goals. From here, numbers get a bit sparse as Duquesne touts three players with two goals.

In the net for Duquesne, senior Jarrod Duffy will most likely be seeing some solid minutes, with a 1.07 goals against average.

The Minutemen return to Amherst with momentum at their backs. Last weekend, UMass (8-5-1, 5-3-0 A-10) split a road trip losing 2-0 to Fordham, yet bounced back in the second game to shutout LaSalle 3-0, snapping a two game losing streak.

On the UMass attack sophomore Jon Hanna, Jake Brodsky and senior Dave Siljanovski each notched a goal in the win.

Sophomore netminder Jeff Jablonski recorded nine saves in the win.

"We have to concentrate this weekend," Koch said. "With St. Bonaventure in the first game, if we take them too lightly, they are a team that could beat us."

While two checks in the W column would most likely propel UMass into the post-season, the weekend marks

UMass-URI volleyball rivalry heats up

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

In what will be its biggest match to date, the Massachusetts volleyball team will try to be the first team in the conference to beat Rhode Island, the No. 1 team in the Atlantic 10, tonight at 7 p.m. at Curry Hicks Cage.

The Minutewomen have already lost to the Rams once this season, on Sept. 20 when they were swept 3-0. Dating back to 1976, the Minutewomen are 5-19 against the Rams.

The squad is now coming off a huge 3-2 win over Virginia Tech, in only its second five-game victory of the year.

UMass coach Bonnie Kenny is encouraged by last weekend's performance, and hopes there will be some momentum left over for URI.

"UMass finally won a five-game match," she joked. "I thought Sarah Watters played great and did a good job of keeping us in the match. Both her and [Dionne] Nash hit the ball well in the fifth game and kept us in it. We lost that fourth game, 15-4. And to come back and win shows self- discipline.

"I think Rhode Island is the best team in the conference. But to be honest, this week we've worked on things we've needed to work on, instead of worrying about them."

And that's probably a good idea. The team, filled with youth and inexperience, is of course still learning. It's hard to fare well against an opponent, especially one like the Rams (19-5, 10-0 A-10) if the team is still dealing with its own strengths and weaknesses.

Rhode Island is led by Angela McHenry and Lauren Maselli. Maselli has 233 kills and a .319 hitting percentage, while leading the team with a 2.5 dig average. McHenry has earned a team-high 263 kills and 182 digs, second only to Maselli's 189.

A number of Minutewomen are playing at their Building collapse kills at least two in Cairo

CAIRO, Egypt (AP) - A 12-story apartment building in suburban Cairo collapsed Sunday, killing at least two people and injuring 17, police said.

The death toll could rise, since police said there were more than 40 apartments in the building and that not all residents were accounted for. Egyptian television reported the structure also housed an X-ray clinic and said patients could have been trapped there.

The building of concrete-block and plaster was believed to be about 30 years old.

It was not immediately clear what caused the collapse, police said.

The building was in Heliopolis, a residential and commercial area on the east side of Cairo. The front and side walls had fallen and only part of the rear wall remained standing. Debris was piled up to about the level of the fifth floor.

Police and rescue workers were trying to remove some of the concrete and other debris searching for survivors. Sniffer dogs were brought to aid in the search, and ambulances stood by to ferry injured to local hospitals.

Charity giving rises five percent last year

WASHINGTON (AP) Americans gave $23.5 billion to the nation's 400 biggest charities last year, giving most generously to the Salvation Army, the American Red Cross and Catholic Charities USA.

Giving was up 5 percent from a year earlier, The Chronicle of Philanthropy's annual survey of the 400 nonprofit organizations receiving the most private money showed. The 1994 increase was 6.3 percent.

Charities on the newspaper's "Philanthropy 400" list received about $1 out of every $6 donated to nonprofits.

Although donations to the Salvation Army dropped by 11.3 percent, that organization topped the list for the fourth consecutive year with collections of $644.3 million.

The American Red Cross, number two for three years, raised $456.6 million, which represented a 7.9 percent drop from 1994. A 25-percent increase in giving to Catholic Charities USA boosted that organization from No. 7 to No. 3 on the list, as it raised $419.4 million last year.

GEO contract negotiated in Fri. demands

THANG VO/ COLLEGIAN

Christian Weller, a graduate economics student, participated in the GEO rally last Friday morning in front of Whitmore building.

Protestors storm Whitmore to support the GEO; student demonstrators demand better working rights

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Students and staff supporting the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) protested outside the Whitmore Administration Building Friday in support of union representatives negotiating a new GEO contract with administration officials inside.

Protestors got as far as the Chancellor's Office before leaving the building.

Child care, health care, job security, higher wages and access to the University of Massachusetts were the major issues of concern voiced by those in attendance.

"Every issue that GEO members are fighting for fits into the University mission as a public institution, which is to serve poor and working people," GEO President Patrick Crowley said. "We want to make sure that when [Chancellor David K.] Scott dreams, acts and leads, he's not moving away from the University mission and leaving these people behind."

About 125 persons attended the protest in support of GEO. Many carried signs, some of which read, "UMass is whiter than this sign! It's Access Stupid!," "UMass works because GEO works," and "Where do our children play?"

An undergraduate student from Mt. Holyoke College, Leylac Pekin, attended the rally in support of GEO.

"It's important that all students in the five college community support each other," she said. "The GEO members deserve a living wage and child care."

The GEO bargaining team negotiated their contract with the Administration's bargaining team as the protest was taking place.

The team is asking for higher pay, increasing their salaries to $12,000, as well as the waiving of all University fees. Comprehensive health care and fully subsidized child care are two more points of GEO concern.

According to GEO, the average salary of all graduate student employees is $6,900.

"Every GEO member is living below the poverty line," GEO member Tom Taaffe said.

"We need a lot more interaction with undergraduate students. In 1991 we only won our contract negotiations with the support of the Student Government Association (SGA)," GEO member Christian Weller said.

SGA President Maurice Caston, attended the protest.

"GEO is very important to us," Caston said. "We all benefit from the work of Teaching Assistants (TA). If they can't support themselves, then they can't teach."

The GEO bargaining team came out of their session and joined the protesters.

"There has been a lot of good talk. Over the last six months we have closed several issues, but there is still no money," Taaffe said. "The Administration needs to bring some money to table."

The protesters then stormed inside of Whitmore and entered into the Chancellor's Office, chanting and carrying signs in support of their cause.

After approximately five minutes, the protesters left the building and continued the rally outside.

Whitmore negotiates third contract amid tension

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), a division of United Auto Workers Local 2322, includes every graduate student employee at the University of Massachusetts, including Teaching Assistants.

GEO has been in existence for six years. They are presently negotiating their third contract with the Administration.

In 1995/1996, GEO helped save their members $4,508 in curriculum and health fees through negotiations.

"GEO is our voice with the Administration," GEO President Patrick Crowley said.

According to GEO, a major priority of the union is to protect the working rights of their members.

They also protect members from "unreasonable workload assignments," and from employer violations of contract stipulations agreed to by the University.

GEO has successfully gained increases in stipends for their members, obtained tuition and curriculum fee waivers and negotiated for vacation time in recent years.

In addition, GEO is presently looking for new organizers who are interested in representing their department within the union and signing up new members.

Seven committees need the help of more members as well. They include political action, bargaining, civil rights, grievance, contract campaign, finance and literature and education.

They are located at 210 Student Union Building and can be contacted by phone at 545-5317 or via e-mail at geo@situnix.oit.umass.edu.

University Store security policies discussed

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

Campus Center Administration (CCA) was under fire Friday afternoon, when students and administrators met in a heated discussion concerning the recent false accusations of stealing at the University Store.

Representatives from the Student Government Association (SGA), the Graduate Student Senate (GSS), The Collegiate Committee for Education of Black and Other Minority Students (CCEBMS), The Campus Center Student Union Commission (CCSUC) and other concerned students demanded that the CCA address issues concerning the University Store.

Director of Business and Facilities Services of Campus Center Elizabeth Dale began by describing the atmosphere around which the meeting was called. She made reference to the rally outside of the University Store — and later Whitmore — which took place a week ago. The rally was in response to a faulty accusation of stealing toward an African American student by student security at the University Store.

Since the rally, Deputy Chancellor Marcellete Williams, Vice Chancellor Paul Page and Dale have released a letter apologizing to the student who was falsely accused, and said that they would begin a dialogue with students to review and revise the security policies at the University Store.

The letter also said, "Effective immediately, the University Store would cease the use of student security staff."

Dale showed two boxes full of merchandise taken from the University Store since the beginning of the semester. She said that $1,100 was lost to theft in the first eight weeks of the semester. Based on a year-end store inventory, the store loses $125,000 worth of merchandise to theft each year.

She then introduced two former members of University Store security to explain current store policy concerning theft at the store.

Student security explained that they are paid minimum wage and receive new trainees each semester. The only training received is from one session with UMass police.

According to store security, suspects are identified based on suspicious behavior such as: looking at the ceiling for cameras, cupping merchandise and being in commonly robbed departments like toiletries.

They also watch for easily accessible pockets, baggy clothing and open pants. These certain types of clothing are based on what UMass police have advised them to look for.

When they are certain that someone has stolen merchandise, they follow the suspect through the store until they leave, whereupon security asks the suspect to step back into the store to follow another store security representative.

The suspect is led to the back of the store, read their Miranda rights, then asked if they have stolen anything. If it is their first time stealing, they will go before the student judiciary board of the SGA. If they have stolen before, the police are contacted.

Store security said that over 50 shoplifters have been apprehended this semester; two to three of them have been "false busts." Store security currently receives no diversity or sensitivity training.

CCEBMS advisor Floyd Martin expressed concerns that the discussion was occurring at the wrong level. He said that it should not take place between students but between their supervisors.

GSS president Deepick Mayra criticized Dale's attitude that the store was losing money, and therefore they

Clothesline display aids anti-violence message

By Dana Quagliariello and Jess Arsenault
Collegian Correspondents

At Pulaski Park in Northampton on Saturday, the violence experienced by women was illustrated with the visual display of The Clothesline Project.

This clothesline was decorated with shirts representing women's experiences of violence created by the survivors or by loved ones. Each shirt told the personal stories, feelings and emotions of the individuals who participated.

The struggles were represented by a color code. White shirts symbolized women who have died of violence; yellow and beige shirts for women who have been battered or assaulted; red, pink or orange shirts represented women who have been raped or sexually assaulted; blue and green shirts symbolized women who were victims of incest or child sexual abuse; and purple or lavender shirts told stories of women who were attacked because of their sexual orientation.

Statistics from the National Victim Center state that one out of two women will be in a violent relationship. The U.S. Justice Department offers that every minute of every day more than one woman is raped in America. Before the age of 18, one out of three girls and one out of seven boys will be victims of incest or sexual assault, according to the Survivors of Incest Anonymous.

With these realities, the Clothesline Project acknowledges women from all backgrounds and offers their display as a type of healing process for survivors of violence. There are several purposes that the project keeps in mind.

First, the Clothesline bears witness to the survivors as well as the victims of the war against women. Secondly, their purpose is to help with the healing process for people who have lost

UM hosts Wildlife Society event

By Liz Anderson
Collegian Staff

This past weekend, the University of Massachusetts Department of Forestry and Wildlife Management held the Wildlife Society's annual Northeast Student Conclave. Nine universities participated, coming together at the Hunington 4–H Center in Spencer, MA to sign up for a weekend full of speakers, games and field trips celebrating the environment.

The weekend–long conference began on Saturday morning with a 7 a.m. breakfast in Stmiley Hall, followed by welcoming remarks by John MacDonald, the UMass representative to the Wildlife Society, Dr. Rebecca Field, the Chapter Advisor and April Tores, the chapter president.

At 10 a.m., the conference turned its focus to ecological issues with environmental workshops and field trips throughout the Pioneer Valley.

Walker Korby, a undergraduate at UMass, led a workshop on animal tracking. The outdoor seminar took place in the woods, investigating different animal tracks, age, physiology, movement and trailing.

Renowned naturalist and photographer John Green led a hike through the Quabbin Reservoir.

The Quabbin watershed supplies eastern Massachusetts with drinking water. The reserve contains some of the oldest forest in Massachusetts.

Green examined summer's transition into autumn in the forest and emphasized wildlife's reflection of the change in season.

Later, there was a tour of the Richard Cronan Fish Hatchery, a local fish breeding facility that supplies central and western Massachusetts. This trip included not only a tour of the facilities at the hatchery, but also a discussion of some fisheries management techniques related to hatcheries and stocking.

Environmental educator Scott Jackson led a tour focusing on the wetlands ecology surrounding the Spencer 4–H camp.

Participants in the conference had the opportunity to see wildlife up close and personal at the Raptor Rehabilitation Center. Responsible for the rehabilitation and captive breeding of birds, the center is the home of more than 50 birds, including 16 species.

Tom Ricardy, the coordinator of the center, gave a lecture on the natural history of different bird species and personal stories of birds.

The conference explored the woodlands of the Harvard Forest. Established in 1907, the forest has served as a base for research and education in forest biology. John O'Keefe, a museum coordinator, led the faculty and students through the forest to examine the historical and modern changes in New England woodlands resulting from the human and natural disturbance processes.

O'Keefe gave a lecture illustrating land use and management history of the area with a formative slide show and tour of Harvard Forests' famous dioramas. Participants also had the opportunity for a short hike, where they explored some of the aspects of forest wildlife interactions.

A representative from Massachusetts Fish and Wildlife Service led an informative demonstration of radio telemetry in the surrounding woodlands and fields of the Spencer 4–H Club.

Professional birders led hikes throughout the woods in search for rare species of wildlife.

The Spencer 4–H Club also provided canoes for a clinic on canoeing techniques. Participants of this clinic had the opportunity to take in the fall foliage in and around the area on the guided canoe trip.

All of the workshops and field trips ended at 1:30 p.m., and were followed by a Wildlife Quiz Bowl. The Wildlife Quiz Bowl is a very competitive conservation game for the universities show off their wildlife knowledge.

The Conclave dinner concluded the conference with a keynote speaker at the Spencer 4–H camp. Dr. Tom French, assistant director for Massachusetts division of fisheries and wildlife department of natural heritage and endangered species, gave a lecture about environmental issues and their effect on the future of the earth.

Finally at 8:30 p.m., local bands played at a social, allowing the students to exchange theories and reflect on the day.

"This is a very important opportunity for students to meet other students from wildlife programs in the Northeast and to see wildlife issues in Massachusetts by learning about biology and having fun." Associate Professor and Assistant Unit Leader of the Wildlife Society Rebecca Shield said.

The other universities participating in the event included: the University of West Virginia; Pennsylvania State University; State University of New York; the University of Connecticut; the University of Maine; the University of New Hampshire; the University of Rhode Island; and the University of Vermont.

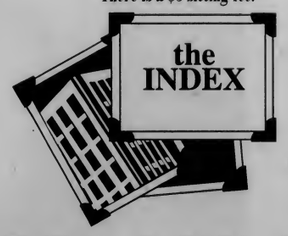
a loved one or are survivors of this violence. To educate, document and raise society's awareness of the extent of the problem of violence against women is an extremely important purpose, as well. Finally, the Clothesline Project hopes to provide a nationwide network of support, encouragement and information for other communities starting their own Clotheslines.

The Project originally began as a grassroots approach to breaking the silence about violence against women that plagues the country and beyond. This epidemic is a war being waged on local, as well as global and national fronts. Local communities were the first to begin hanging shirts to visually display the violence.

The first 31 shirts hung along the seashore in Hyannis, Massachusetts on Oct. 8, 1990, to represent the societal violence that is a part of too many women's lives. The Cape Cod Massachusetts Women's Agenda developed the project after discovering that over 51,000 women had been murdered in this country by their husbands or lovers over a period of 16 years during the Vietnam War, while war casualties totalled a close 58,000.

The Clothesline Project manages to provide an honest medium for women to express their anger and reclaim their lives by illustrating the impact of the widespread violence, the extent of its effect, and the prevalence with which the terror occurs. It links together various forms of violence targeting women as the first public movement of its kind.



Upon viewing the Line, emotions ran deep including disbelief, horror, pain and sorrow. Self–empowerment seemed to be the motivator for the viewers and creators alike. As one survivor stated, "We mourn the victims. We take action as survivors."

Currently, there are over 250 Projects in 26 states with over 35,000 shirts created. There are also international chapters in Canada, England and Tanzania.

To participate, make a donation, start a Clothesline in your area, organize a display or to request further information contact 55 Chestnut Street, Northampton, MA 01060.

Hillel offers new folk dance class

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Students interested in Israeli folk dancing should check out the bi–weekly class offered at the Hillel House.

"One of the neat things about Israeli dancing is that it bridges the cultural gap between Jews and Arabs," Ezra Weinberge said.

Weinberge teaches the class, which focuses on dances from 1950 to the present, every other week at the Hillel House. The next class will be Wednesday at 7:30 p.m.

Weinberge describes Israel as a "salad bowl" of Jews from different cultures around the world — which is reflected in their dance traditions.

Weinberge said much of the music used with Israeli dancing is sung in Arabic because many Jews came from other Middle Eastern countries.

Israeli dancing traces its roots to Eastern European, Safardic (Spanish) and Arabic traditions. More recently, music for Israeli dancing boasts a techno–flare, he said.

Weinberge was introduced to Israeli dancing through his involvement with a Zionist socialist youth movement, Habonim Bror.

After Weinberge graduated high school, he spent a year in Israel working on a Kibutz. There, his exposure to Israeli dancing was further enriched.

"It is part of the (Israeli) culture, some chose to ignore it," Weinberge said. "Dancing has been one of the most enjoyable parts of my Jewish culture experience."

He said the most prevalent example of folk dancing in Israel is on Israeli independence day, when people are seen dancing in the streets.

So far, each class has attracted about 10 people, and he hopes more will attend.

"So far our class has primarily attracted women. I would like to see more men in the class also," Weinberge said.

Weinberge is the son of Amherst rabbi Sheila Weinberge. He attended Rutgers University for two years and is currently a part–time student at Hampshire College.

Abortion rights face challenge in Pa.

LAPORTE, Pa. (AP) — One August night, a 13–year–old girl crept from her house to meet a woman who offered to help the child get an abortion. It was the woman's stepson who'd impregnated the girl. Because Pennsylvania law requires parental notification in cases of such young females, the woman, Rosa Marie Hartford, took the girl across the state line into New York.

Now, in a case activists have called a historic challenge to abortion rights, Hartford is going on trial on a charge of interfering with the custody of a child. Jury selection begins Monday.

"I was helping out," Hartford has said.

The prosecutor says that's not the point.

"It's kind of the old saying," said District Attorney Max Little. "It's 11 o'clock — do you know where your children are?" Hartford's lawyers from the Center for Reproductive Law and Policy in New York said this case is about abortion, not child safety.

"Nowhere else in the nation has a prosecution occurred when an individual has assisted a woman to exercise her constitutional rights," said lead attorney Kathryn Kolbert.

"My biggest fear is that young women will be frightened by this case and not seek medical advice," she said.

Kolbert was the attorney who argued before the U.S. Supreme Court against the Pennsylvania parental consent law. The Supreme Court upheld the law in 1992.

Hartford's lawyers said they won't comment further on the case until the trial is completed.

Little said the central issue is that the girl was too young to agree to the 60–mile trip to Binghamton, N.Y. The age of consent is 14 in Pennsylvania.

The girl left her home early Aug. 31, 1995, and hopped in Hartford's car. When her mother later called Sullivan County High School to leave a message for her daughter, an administrator said the teen–ager never made it to school.

The mother called police and filed a missing–person report. The woman didn't know her daughter was pregnant until the girl's friends told her later that day.

Hartford faces up to six years in prison, but the prosecutor said he won't seek a jail sentence — only try to send a message. "Who has the right and or duty to attend to medical care, especially when it involved potentially life–threatening hazardous procedures? I don't know that somebody across the street has the right to do that," Little said.

"I don't feel guilty of anything," Hartford, a factory worker and mother of six, told The Times Leader of Wilkes–Barre last year. "I'm not a criminal.

Her 19–year–old stepson, Michael Kilmer, who impregnated the girl, later pleaded guilty to two counts of statutory rape. Since Pennsylvania's new abortion law went into effect two years ago, said Kolbert, many women have been getting abortions in other states with fewer restrictions, including New York and New Jersey.

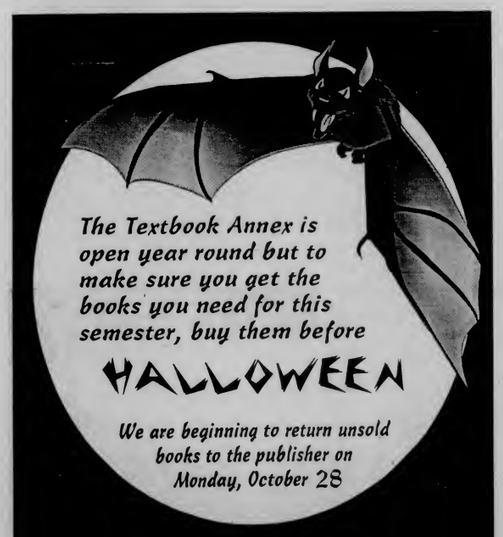
were not to blame.

"It's not about operating at a loss, or numbers, it's about addressing student problems," Mayra said.

According to Dale, in response to last weeks protest, Campus Center administration made a commitment to meet. When it was discovered that the only training students received was from police, and that student security was made up of only white students, they decided to stop using students as security at the store.



The store currently has 25 staff members of color out of 300 total, according to Store Manager John Kuusisto.

"Why does it take an incident like this now, when it should have been addressed long before?" ALANA caucus coordinator Megan de Mañano asked the administrators.

Dale said that coming up with a solution to satisfy student needs would be a priority for her in the coming weeks, adding that this was her first semester of being director of Business and Facilities Services."

She agreed that in the next two weeks, the administration would have the paperwork committed to begin a search process for a upper level administrator in the CCA, with half the search committee made up of students. She said they would study the numbers of people of color at the store by unit and report those figures in two weeks, investigate electronic surveillance, look at job descriptions of staff in the store to ensure it reflects the diverse population, and that by the end of the semester they would have a plan in practice.

"You have to show hard evidence to get students of color to go into the store," junior political science major Zoe Kamara said, adding that she had applied and been turned down four times for a security position at the University Store.

Bad sports ruin the fun

Casey Kane

I've got a problem.

You see, I love sports. I like to watch a game on television, I'll listen to a game on the radio, my TV is constantly set on ESPN, and there is nothing better than a good road trip to catch a game.

But now, a decidedly evil factor is seeping into the sports world. Athletics, in their purest form, can still make everything seem right, but nowadays a very unsportsmanlike element is becoming omnipresent in that world. And I don't know what to do.

Flip on the evening news and it is almost too easy to see that the sports world's sugar–coating is starting to crack. I'm not talking about the superstars who get pulled over for drunk driving or even the Lawrence Philips and Christian Peters of the world. It goes even deeper than that.

Take the case in Albuquerque, NM last week. A member of the local high school football team got a little roughed up in a game. That's nothing new — I mean football is the prototype of a contact sport. However, his father's retaliation was what got attention.

The kid's dad took serious offense to his son getting tossed around and took matters into his own hands. He took the buckle off the side of his son's helmet and sharpened it. He sharpened it and polished it until you could have sworn the word Gillette was imprinted on it.

He put the buckle back on the kid's helmet, and his son played with it like that!

From the reports I have heard, five members of the opposing team were cut with the blade, which was shown on the news easily slicing through sheets of paper.

Five people received injuries, but luckily nobody was seriously hurt because one man thought his son was tackled a bit too much.

The student is currently suspended from school pending investigation into the matter by the city's District Attorney.

If that's not enough, look at the case in Florida. This story is a sad commentary of sportsmanship these days. A 51– year–old man was golfing, albeit slowly, one afternoon. That shouldn't surprise anyone — golf is supposed to be played slowly, it's golf.

Anyway, this gentleman was playing golf and on one hole hit the ball off to the side of the fairway. He went to retrieve the ball, and as he was searching through the rough or the rocks or the water, wherever he hit the ball, the three men playing behind him grew impatient.

But instead of waiting or asking to play through, they decided to pick a fight. A 26–year–old who was in that impatient threesome intentionally hit his ball in the direction of the older man. After walking to meet his ball, he began shouting at the 51–year–old man.

The shouts escalated into a few shoves and then the younger man threw a punch. The older man responded with a punch of his own and the 26–year–old retaliated with a swift kick — to the older guy's chest.

The man collapsed and was rushed to a hospital, where he later died because of that kick. The threesome responsible ran away before an ambulance or authorities could be summoned, although they were later caught.

The saddest part of this story was that it all happened right in front of the 51–year–old's son.

The mayor of the town where all this happened said it was, "a sad commentary on sportsmanship and impatience."

That doesn't even begin to get the point across. What has become of common decency when football players are maimed because of an opponent's over–emotional father, or when golfers are scared to death to play because they're scared of death.

Recently, the Fresno State men's basketball team gave a walk–on tryout to a guy. While that's not remarkable (basketball teams often give walk–on tryouts), the man was a 35–year–old who had just come back to college. The team just wanted to give him a chance. The story is nothing remarkable, but it does have a nice feel about it.

Maybe we need more of that.

Letters to the Editor

Organizations offer more than registration

To the editor:

In the Monday Oct. 21 issue of the Collegian, Matthew Wurtzel wrote about "Seeing beyond registration." As Voter Education Coordinator for Mass student PIRG, I feel the need to respond to the frustration evident in Mr. Wurtzel's article.

In the article, Mr. Wurtzel describes voter registration volunteers as "pushy" who harass "students as they enter the Bluewall for coffee." I highly disagree with this depiction. In fact, I would like to commend the SGA and SCERA's work. They were successful in getting over 7,000 students registered to vote. I worked closely with Frank Mozell and his staff as well as organize my own group of dedicated volunteers. They worked solely on the desire to empower students.

Voting is one of the strongest powers we have. As students, we remain largely ignored in the American political system. Decision of our elected officials, increasingly determined by campaign donations of special interests, have little to do with the real concerns of students. By registering over 7,000 students to vote, the University of Massachusetts has the possibility of being the largest voting block in Western Massachusetts.

Mr. Wurtzel also wrote "if student activists want to improve upon student involvement in politics, then they must educate rather than simply solicit student signatures." I whole heartedly agree, which is why I took on the role of Voter Education Coordinator.

The main goals of SCERA and Mass student PIRG's youth vote campaigns are threefold: registration, education, and mobilization. The Youth Vote '96 coalition, which presently includes almost 30 RSOs, administrators and organizations will be kicking off its education campaign this Monday, Oct. 28 by sponsoring a voter education forum. The forum will address political issues of special interest to students, the democratic process, how the government works, how students can make a difference and most importantly, why an individual should vote.

In addition to this forum, the organizations involved in the coalition are organizing tabling and publicity devoted to education the student populace about issues important to them.

The coalition will also be focusing on mobilization, educating students registered locally about where to go to register will be transporting students to the polling places.

The Youth Vote Coalition is working just as intensively on voter education and mobilization as they have on registration. I encourage Mr. Wurtzel to attend the forum on the 28th as well as his readers, so that they may all become educated and no longer feel frustrated about the campus approach to this election.

Stacey Shackford
MassPIRG Voter Education Coordinator

So much for understanding

To the editor:

I acknowledge the article, "So much for diversity" by Ann Rubinstein was eloquently expressed. My impression is that Miss Rubinstein's issue is with the University and the vagueness of their definition of multiculturalism and diversity. However, I feel some of her opinions are based on misinformation and I would like to clarify some of those misconceptions.

Miss Rubinstein stated, "As of this semester, the fourth floor of my building is reserved only for Asians. Some of my friends were kicked out of their rooms on the top floor for no reason other than the color of their skin. Other friends of mine were moved up there from other floors of building, against their will, because of their ethnicity. I think this is a form of discrimination and segregation." The fourth floor of Dwight is reserved this semester for people who want to learn about the broad spectrum of the Asian community. However, the residents last year were not kicked out, they were all (whites and non–whites) reassigned by Housing with first priority for rooms in Dwight in addition to other dormitories.

This is not the first reassignment that has taken place in this University. For the last two years, some residents of John Adams (JA) were relocated because a TAP program was formed. In JA, residents were relocated because they were not freshmen and in Dwight, the residents were reassigned not because they are not of Asian descent, but because a new program is being implemented. The reassigned residents were given a choice to participate in the SIRP.

Thus, this is not an issue of skin color but one of culture. The Asian community is composed of different cultures: Korean, Chinese, Cambodian, Vietnamese, etc. Therefore, the Asian / Asian American Floor is multicultural, contrary to Rubinstein's beliefs. Anyone who wishes to live on the SIRP floor must sign a contract with Housing, hence no one is forced to live on the floor against their will.

There are several reasons why the Asian floor is necessary. According to Caplan College Information there are approximately 76 percent Caucasian and only 5–7 percent Asian in UMass Amherst. This shows that there is a major possibility there are floors with all Caucasian residents. Another reason is English is a second language for most Asians who move into this University. This is a large transition for most of them. The SIRP program is a stepping stone for Asian students to get acquainted with the campus by offering a sense of community that's somewhat similar to their own. By sharing their fears, ideas and dreams with people having the same background, they know that they are not alone. When they are more comfortable with their environment, they have the choice to move onto another floor or building. Interaction works both ways: residents on this SIRP floor interact with other nationalities and it is encouraged that other nationalities interact with them.

I would like to take this opportunity to state the purpose, goal and mission of the Asian / Asian American Floor. The purpose of this SIRP is to create a living and learning environment conducive to all areas of growth for students of Asian descent. The primary goal of this SIRP is to support and educate the Asian / Asian American students and to be a resource for them. The secondary goal is to inform the UMass Amherst community about the experiences of Asian / Asian American students at UMass Amherst. The mission of the SIRP is to create a supportive atmosphere for Asian / Asian American student through educational, cultural and social programming. It is our goal to promote interaction with all residents.

It is not a criterion that students on the fourth floor of Dwight be of Asian descent. Non–Asian students shouldn't feel there's one flight of stairs that one has to step upon to break down the stereotype of the Asian community.

A swell dame and a cup of joe

Daniel E. Levenson

So there I am, walking through the Campus Center, head lost in a cloud of classroom crap, trying to avoid eye contact with the people handing out pamphlets on everything from donating to blood to religious salvation.

It's raining outside.

A cold and windy rain.

The kind of rain that falls from the sky and crawls on your back.

I pause by the windows and stare vacantly at the outside world.

It's cold out there.

And raining.

I turn around and face the Campus Center collection of students rushing around. It's not a pleasant prospect.

It was the kind of unpleasant prospect that rolls around in your stomach until it claws its way up to your brain and spins around in your mind like loose change in a dryer.

And not small change either.

Quarters.

Lots of them.

So I head down to the Collegian.

It's a newspaper.

I work there.

The newsroom is fairly quiet, no one rushing around. Not yet anyway.

So I start typing a story. The computer's looking at me funny. I hate computers.

After I'm done I head back to my dorm room. It's a small room, filled with cockroaches and mutant turtles.

That last part isn't true.

It's a long way to the top. In an elevator, that is.

Elevators can make a person do wacky things.

Like counting the lady bugs on the ceiling, or pushing the "door open" button, to close the doors.

Positively nutty.

And then there was this dame.

She had a smile like sunshine that even blind men could see.

I was dumbstruck.

But there had to be a double cross.

There always is.

People who talk like they just fell out of a 1950s detective flick worry about things like that.

We have to.

It's our job.

Anyway, back to the dame.

She lived down the street in a building. A concrete building. The kind of concrete that people build with.

All of the sudden, the phone rang. It wasn't a loud ring.

It was Whitmore on the phone.

They wanted to talk politely. I didn't. I hung up the phone.

By now the sun was setting. Dropping out of the sky like a burning hot star falling behind the couch of life.

The next day I was working the late shift down at the Collegian. Putting in some extra hours. Trying to get by in the cruel, cold world of college news media.

It isn't easy.

You can't get a decent cup of joe in the Campus Center basement.

It was getting close to midnight when the call came in. A cat was trapped in a tree. It was the kind of cat that liked to climb trees. A small, furry little thing with a sharp set of claws.

The kind of claws that could cut newspaper.

It had climbed up a tree.

A big tree.

The kind of tree you look at and think "wow, that's a big tree."

I told them I'd be right there. I hopped on my trusty steed, Shooter, and headed off towards the Library.

When I arrived on the scene, the cat was still in the tree.

It was meowing.

A soft, whiny sort of meow.

The kind of meow that could go unnoticed in the Big City.

I watched the Fire Department rescue the cat.

It was exciting. Not the kind of excitement you get from a lecture class in Mahar auditorium. But pretty damn close.

So I leave the cat thing and head back to the Collegian. As soon as I get there the phone rings. I pause before picking it up.

Whoever was on the other end of that line would have a story to tell.

There are lots of people out there.

With lots of stories to tell.

And then in walks this dame.

But that's another story.

Zionism Revealed

Elana Silverman

"Ever since the state of Israel was established in 1948, the Arab states have waged war against her on four fronts: military, diplomatic, economic, and propaganda. Punctuating the gunfire, there has been a never ending propaganda fusillade to capture world opinion and to isolate Israel," — Si Kenen, of the Near East Report.

I would like to take a moment to clarify the aims of Zionism and distortion of Israeli history that have been associated with out–of–context quotes and historical revisionism.

Myth: "Zionism is racism."

Fact: Zionism is the national liberation movement of the Jewish people. Zionism is the culmination of thousands of years of Jewish oppression leading to the ultimate realization of the need for a refuge. Many Christians have traditionally supported the goals and ideals of Zionism. The Israeli Jewish population is very diverse with Jews of many colors representing 100 different countries.

A half million Moslem and Christian Arabs, Druze, Bha'is, Circassians and other ethnic groups are also voting citizens of Israel. Arabs hold seats in Israel's parliament, the Knesset. Arabic, like Hebrew, is an official language of Israel. All children, be they Arab or Jewish, are required to attend school. In fact, the establishment of the state of Israel has brought tremendous opportunity for local Arabs, including education, employment and other economic benefits. Ninety percent of Arab children attend school as compared with 45 percent before Israel was established.

In Arab states, citizenship is strictly defined by native parental origin. In some Arab states, including Algeria and Saudi Arabia, it is almost impossible to become a naturalized citizen. Other Arab countries have laws that help foreign–born Arabs to become naturalized, but these laws exclude Palestinians. Israel is an open and democratic country, therefore religious rights of Christians and Moslems are fully protected. Israeli law guarantees the rights of every religious community.

In contrast, nearly every state that proclaims Islam as its national religion, minority groups are oppressed and harassed. Israel is the sole country in the Middle East that holds meaningful free elections, has an open press, and guarantees the rights of women. This record is quite impressive when compared to that of surrounding countries.

Myth: "Arabs were displaced by Jewish settlement."

Fact: According to British inquires these complaints were false. Most of the land that eventually became Israel was arid land that was purchased by Jews from the British government, which owned 80 percent of the land at that time. Moshe Aumann, in his Land Ownership in Palestine 1880–1948 wrote: "Rich black soil in 1944, Jews paid between $1,000 and $1,500 per acre in Palestine, mostly for arid or semi–arid land, in the same year in Iowa was selling for about $110 per acre."

When large scale Jewish immigration began to occur in Palestine, the Arab immigration rates which had been lagging prior to 1922 began to rise drastically due to new employment opportunities.

Myth: "The establishment of the Jewish state violated the right of the Palestinian Arabs to self–determination."

Fact: In 1947, the United Nations offered self– determination both to the Palestinian Arabs and the Jews. In the U.N. Partition Plan both the Jews and the Palestinians were offered independent states. The Arabs immediately rejected the proposal. It was the Arabs who rejected the possibility of a Palestinian state as they wanted all the territory. The only group in the Middle East who supported the creation of a Palestinian–Arab state were the Palestinian Jews!

Myth: "All Zionists support a single plan of action to solve the Palestinian–Israeli conflict."

Fact: The term "Zionist" can refer to some one who believes in living in the state of Israel, someone who wants to expand the borders of Israel, or simply someone who supports Israel. Some Zionists reject the idea of Palestinian statehood pointing to the fact that a "Palestinian state" already exists in Jordan due to its majority Palestinian population. In fact, the grandfather of King Hussein of Jordan, Abdullah, originally wanted to call Jordan the "Hashemite Kingdom of Palestine." King Hussein himself was quoted in 1984 in the Kuwaiti newspaper Al–Anba as saying, "Jordan in itself is Palestine."

Others, such as former prime minister of Israel Shimon Peres, and his predecessor, Yitzhak Rabin, believed in the ideas of Palestinian autonomy and statehood. They felt that without the establishment of a Palestinian state in Gaza and Judaen–Samaria, the Palestinian–Israeli peace process would not come to a concrete solution.

"Zionism is creating a society, however imperfect it may still be, which tried to implement the highest ideals of a democracy — political, social and cultural — for all inhabitants of Israel, irrespective of religious belief, race, or sex." — Yagi Allon.

Israel has built one of the most highly ethical societies in the world and continues to try to negotiate peace with its neighbors.

Lee's cross-country ride a fine directorial venture

GET ON THE BUS
Directed by Spike Lee with Andre Braugher, Charles S. Dutton, Ossie Davis Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters.

Bonding on the bus... Andre Braugher and Hill Harper start their journey with a smile.

This year marks the 10–year anniversary of She's Gotta Have It, Spike Lee's feature film debut. Since then, he has established himself as one of the most innovative and influential film makers working today. He has co–opted nearly every known genre with some success. Aside from the abundance of socially–conscious dramas, Lee has made musicals (School Daze), comedies (Girl 6), and historical biopics (Malcolm X).

With his latest, he has created some sort of mutant amalgamation–, the story of a busload of men from South Central L.A. on their way to last October's Million Man March. Lee transforms what has the dismal prospects of being after–the–fact propaganda for Louis Farrakhan's march into a heartfelt string of monologues told from a dozen of the bus passengers — think of it as 12 Angry Men meets The Canterbury Tales.

The opening credits cut to quick shots of an unknown black man in manacles, a powerful image that seems almost unrelated to the film. Among the bus's passengers are a father and son (Thomas Jefferson Byrd and DeAundre Bonds) who are literally chained at the hip as part of a rehabilitation program for the delinquent son. The film's final shot shows the chain used to bind the two left behind at the Lincoln Monument. Unfortunately, the film doesn't seem to offer enough solutions to warrant the symbolic use of the manacle in the opening credits.

What is extremely engaging about the story are the contrasts, albeit slightly contrived, that arise from the various passengers. Combing old and young, straight and gay, Christian and Muslim, Lee forces the audience to acknowledge the many variations in the black community trying to come together for a common goal.

A standout character is Andre Braugher's (from TV's "Homicide") Flip, an out–of–work actor looking to become the next Denzel. Filled with derision for fellow passengers, Braugher's loud–mouthed rantings show that one of the greatest obstacles these passengers heed to overcome is their attitudes toward each other.

Another pleasant surprise comes in its acknowledgement of one of the problems of the Million Man March — the exclusion of women from the cause. This alienation shows itself when Gary (Roger Guenveur Smith) gets dropped off at the bus station by his acerbic girlfriend. She is unable to understand why he has to go to an event that specifically rejects her gender.

Reggie Rock Blythwood's script is a successful debut: what lacks in plot is made up with its unique characters. Ossie Davis' mesmerizing voice makes you want to listen to him read the phone book. Davis begins the bus ride with an invocation which Blythwood should be proud of.

Get on the Bus has a downside, and it comes in its use of music as a character on the bus. It peaks too early when the passengers go around singing a roll call. Music, intended to be featured in the background, overpowers the characters' monologues and some of what could have been the film's more powerful moments. B

Rap–forefathers throw the last poetic punch in Amherst

By Daniel Bodah
Collegian Staff

Way back in the '50s, South African poet Kgositle wrote that the time for poetry and art was over. Now, he said, will come a time of bullets and arrows, when "the only poem you will hear will be the spearpoint pivoted in the punctured marrow of the villain... therefore, we are the last poets of the world."

Some years later, over in the United States, several young African–American poets performed at a commemoration of the birth of Malcolm X in Harlem's Mouni Morris park. Soon to name themselves the Last Poets, they took the stage echoing a chant used by Howard University protesters two months earlier: "Are you ready, niggers? You got to be ready!" To their minds, the revolution and Armageddon were just moments away.

It's this pressing social message that has motivated the Last Poets' work since then. Their lyrics spring out of folk currents such as the toast, adding in doses of radical consciousness inspired by the likes of Amiri Baraka and Malcolm X, all laid over a bed of traditional African drumming. The debt owed to the Last Poets by rap and hip–hop performers is clear, but they've also influenced many others: filmmakers Spike Lee and John Singleton, and jazz/blues singer Gil Scott–Heron have all taken the message of the Poets to heart.

The group has gone through numerous conflicts and splits in the years since their 1970 self–titled debut. The result is that one can never be sure exactly which performers will be there when the "Last Poets" perform. It could be Jalal Nuriddin and Suleiman El–Hadi; both in the case of tonight's Amherst show, original member Abiodun Oyewole and teammate Umar Bin Hassan. This is the pair that recorded the 1994 release Holy Terror (on Bill Laswell's Black Arc label), as well as the Mouth Almighty album, coming in spring 1997 from Mercury Records.

Hassan joined up with the band after working security at one of their shows. What he brought was a strong critical mind, exemplified by songs such as "White Man's Got a God Complex," and "Niggers Are Scared of Revolution." In the latter song, he challenges the lack of motivation for change he sees within the African–American community. This sort of up–front, no–punches–held political ranting puts the power in the Last Poets' attack, a scathing criticism that they're not afraid to turn inward and stand behind with their actions.

Abiodun dropped out of the band for a while in the '70s because he saw the Last Poets becoming stars, and felt that stardom was no way to advance revolutionary consciousness. Instead, he started a Yoruba Society at Shaw University in North Carolina. Eventually he got involved in a gun heist in which a friend was arrested. With information given him by an SDS member, Abiodun robbed a member the North Carolina Ku Klux Klan for the bail money. This led to a stint in prison, a place Abiodun credits as one of his greatest teachers. Abiodun eventually began working with some of the then–scattered Last Poets again after his release.

Umar put his time in at a different institution: the crackhouse. Obviously, this history may give him a certain integrity in speaking out about some social conditions in the African–American community. Umar's personal strength is proven by the fact that he beat his addiction just using his will — no Narcotics Anonymous, no psychiatric counselling.

Both Umar and Abiodun express disappointments with the current trends in rap. They are especially unhappy with the lack of a positive message they perceive. So for those of you who want to hear a powerful, constructive message fueled with rage, come hear the Last Poets.

The Last Poets will perform at the Amherst College Campus Center tonight at 8 p.m. For more information, call 542–5775.

FAC feels African vibe at tradition-filled concert

CALL AND RESPONSE: DANCE AND MUSIC TRADITIONS OF THE AFRICAN DIASPORA
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
Oct. 24

"Call and Response: Dance and Music Traditions of the African Diaspora" brought together a number of performing groups as a means of exploring the expression of African rhythms, both on that continent and in the Western Hemisphere, each group exhibiting a unique musical creation which provides a tangible release for these rhythms.

The first group to appear on stage was Dougouto Nganya, who offered the enthusiastic audience a "little taste of West Africa." The group consisted of six percussionists, each playing various native African drums.

The members of the group had a charisma and played to the audience. A highlight of the performance came when members of the group played a game similar to the mechanical "Simon Says" of our youth: one drummer set a pattern and the others attempted to match him to the note.

As the night progressed, the flying hands and mallets morphed into flying feet, as Dougouto Nganya gave way to Jimmy Slyde, "a living national treasure." Appearing with Diane Walker, who starred with him in his recent movie, Black and Blue, Slyde was in his glory.

The silver–haired dancer preempted his performance with an announcement that it was "SCT: senior citizen time." Though aging, Slyde combined the showmanship of an old pro with the enthusiasm of a little boy — the result was pure magic. The tap "conversation" between the two dancers was, in fact, a conversation with everyone in attendance at the show. At the conclusion of his section, Slyde told the audience the secret to his success: "You live happy... and dance."

Each of the groups in the show in some way captured the rhythms of their African heritage in a visual or aural art form. Slaves who were brought to South America had to invent their own, because their hands were almost always shackled. Their way of expression centered on feet and leg movements.

Called capoeira, it is a combination of dance, acrobatics, gymnastics and martial arts. Each of the performers in the group Capoeira Camara was very adept in the moves of the art. The men performed routines of difficult maneuvers in white pants, as if to bring attention to the fact that their legs never touched the ground. Their feats were truly amazing, and although capoeira has not yet taken off in the United States, leaders like Deraldo Ferreira are working to increase its visibility in this area.

Cabildo, a group combining music and dance in a way of expressing their Santeria religion, were very entertaining in their opportunity. The frontman of the group commented on the fact that influences like it "cascade into our culture in ways we couldn't imagine." Their musical style was actually a building block for modern rock and R&B.

Another precursor to modern music was exhibited by The Silver Leaf Singers, a 50–year–old musical group whose roots lie in Boston. They sang many of their favorites over the years, such as "I Shall Not Be Moved" and "I'm Workin' on a Building." These 70–something men were the surprise of the evening, providing a jolt to the audience, and inducing all in attendance to rise from their seats clapping and swinging.

For their last number, they were joined on stage by all of the "Call and Response" performers, along with audience members and little children, who together celebrated a successful evening and provided closure on a wonderful night of discovery.

Hook, line and sinker... John Lee Hooker's classic Jealous has been rereleased on Pointblank/Virgin.

Hooker: a reason to be Jealous

John Lee Hooker, composer–guitarist–singer extraordinaire of the blues, is on the recent blues release list with a re–issue of his 1986 album, Jealous (Pointblank/Virgin). Before the Pepsi commercials, Hooker always had style, true soul and virtuous sincerity. This album shows his sincerity as well as his laid–back approach to blues.

With Hooker's prominent '80s touring band, which featured among others Deacon Jones on organ, Mike Osborn on guitar, Tim Richards on drums and Larry Hamilton on bass, he takes the low road on Jealous, keeping things mellow at all times. Most of these songs present the band sinking into a common groove, with Hooker's deep voice booming over it all. "Ninety Days" and "Early One Morning" showcase this groove well. An interesting guest on this album is Bruce Kaphan in his pre–American Music Club days, playing guitar on the ballad, "We'll Meet Again." The drawback to this album is that it's hard to listen to the same formula over and over again. It is a good album in the least, though.

Jazz Blues Weekly

BY JOSHUA BOYD

Jazz veterans show up with new releases in the recent months, two of these being Michael Brecker's Tales From The Hudson (Impulse!) and Gary Bartz, who played with, among many others, Miles Davis at the legendary trumpeter's 1970 Isle of Wight Festival performance.

Blues Chronicles truly is an immensely various, exciting, heartfelt album. Bartz, an alto saxophonist primarily also plays an impressive soprano, paints with music a poignant picture of blues as well as his life and development as a musician. His songs swing between a successful reggae–jazz hybrid cover of Bob Marley's well–known "Lively Up Yourself," loving the optimism and anti–blues of that song, jazz and hip–hop on a few tracks, with 15–year old Nezkar Keith's strong rapping. There is not a bad cut on this record and the best songs are highly captivating.

Unfortunately the same can't be said for Michael Brecker's Tales. The 47–year old Philly native has performed with Horace Silver and Billy Cobham and has made a name for hhmself and his brother trumpet player Randy as the Brecker Brothers. His newest release gets bogged down often by overproduction producing almost an easy–listening sound to some of the songs. There are some good performances like "Song for Bilbao," with guests McCoy Tyner and Don Alias both turning out driving performances in this Coltrane–influenced Pat–Metheny– penned tune. His regular group which includes Jack DeJohnette on drums, Joey Calderazzo on piano, Metheny on guitar and Dave Holland on bass, shine on "Naked Soul," the track's best song.

Various veterans of jazz are prominently featured on 27–year–old jazzman James Carter's Conversin' With The Elders (Atlantic). He brings in Art Ensemble of Chicago trumpeter Lester Bowie for a great reggae–jazz original "Free Reggae–HiBop," which betters Bartz's "Lively Up Yourself," even though Bartz's is the better album. Not that Carter's album is bad, it is quite good. "Blue Creek," with dueling clarinet and bass clarinet is another terrific, mysterious compostlion, this time with Buddy Tate from Count Basie's orchestra. He also converses with Hamiet Bluiett, Harry "Sweets" Edison and a veteran to the Detroit jazz scene, Larry Smith.

Another somewhat new name on the jazz streets of the music world is pianist Cyrus Chestnut. Music training at the Berklee College of Music, and work with Jon Hendricks and Wynton Marsalis has helped shape him into the artist who is recorded on Earth Stories (Atlantic), which, like Bartz's Blues Chronicles, on which Chestnut guests, tells some of his own stories through music. Earth Stories, which sticks mainly to relaxing piano trio music, presents some bright, uplifting piano playing from this 32–year–old. His "Cooldaddy's Perspective" is the only non–trio song on the album, and is a funky horn workout for Antonio Hart on alto. This is a good, relaxing listen from a gospel–based pianist whose love of life and religion is shown through his elevated music.

Mason takes audience to haunting game

The Underseige Stories tells gripping tales of black prison life

By Humphrey brown III
Collegian Staff

THE UNDERSEIGE STORIES
Bowker Auditorium
Oct. 25 & 26

"And it's one, two, three strikes you're out at the old ball game," sang the audience at Bowker Auditorium last Saturday as the Hittite Empire performed The Undersiege Stories.

It may have seemed like an odd request for the audience to sing the much loved baseball anthem, but Keith Antar Mason, head writer and director for Undersiege, had a reason for the song.

The Undersiege Stories took a hard look at America — particularly the American justice system — and how it continues to misrepresent the black and the poor.

The song was a metaphor for the infamous "three strikes and you're out" law that was passed in California in 1994. The law states that anyone receiving three felony convictions will be given 25–to–life in prison and possibly the death penalty.

As the audience sang, led by head writer and director of Undersiege, Keith Antar Mason, the four other members of the Hittite Empire each remained confined to a limited square feet of stage space, mimicking the limited confinement of a prison cell.

Each "prisoner" had a different story to tell. All the stories contained explicit adult material and before they even began, Mason expressed concern about the younger members of the audience being there.

"I always said that no one under the age of 16 should see this show," he said.

The inmate's stories ranged from police brutality and molestation, to O.J. Simpson and how the American justice system has taken it upon itself to punish other black men for the death of Nicole Simpson and a not guilty verdict.

In one monologue, a prisoner told the story of how his son had been kidnapped, raped and left for dead by a serial killer right under the noses of a host of cops who didn't react fast enough to yet another case of a missing young black male.

Mason acted as a host of sorts, speaking directly to the crowd and playing the emotions of the audience like a master puppeteer. In mocking fashion, Mason would interrupt each prisoner monologue with what he called "commercial breaks" and occasionally belt out a famous show tune to let the audience at ease.

After each prisoner told his story, a number of flood lights came on, nearly blinding the audience. Mason wanted the point made clear that this was not your ordinary Eurocentric play where the audience just sat there and listened. Mason talked to the crowd and made them talk back, as did the other prisoners as they told their stories. Yet, Mason hates it when play critics call Undersiege improv.

"I sat and wrote down everything that goes on in this play," Mason explained. "So don't come to me after the show, asking, 'Was this all improvisation.'"

Undersiege painted a raw, no–apologies picture of the horrors of prison and the realities of an unjust criminal justice system. There is no holding back when it comes to this production, so be advised to leave the little ones at home.

Reality is the name of this game, and as The Hittite Empire shows, it ain't all peanuts and Cracker Jacks.

Brubeck takes "Time Out" to cool the Iron Horse

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

THE DAVE BRUBECK QUARTET
Iron Horse Music Hall
Oct. 24

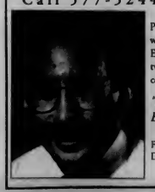
Northampton was treated on Thursday night to a delightful set by veteran pianist and imaginative composer Dave Brubeck and his quartet. The one and a quarter hour set offered mostly relaxed jazz numbers, including a few songs off Brubeck's most celebrated record (as well as the highest–selling jazz album ever), 1959's Time Out.

Right off in the late set, Brubeck kicked into a hard–bop number to get the crowd's blood running, with son Chris on bass trombone, Jack Six, who has been playing with Brubeck for over 20 years, on upright bass and Randy Jones on drums. From there, Brubeck took his band into the 3/4, 2/4, 4/4 meter changes of Time Out's "Three To Get Ready, Four To Go."

Brubeck swung all night between ballads, commoh modern jazz tunes and decorated some of his solos with hints of the classical training he received in his post–WW II service days from mentor Darius Milhaud, a notable French composer. Also clearly evident in his soloing were influences of pre– swing jazz styles like ragtime, Dixieland and the boogie styles of which made Meade Lux Lewis and James P. Johnson famous. There was also some deep blues thrown into the mix.

Jack Six was one of the big stories of the night. The tall bassist, with fingers so thick that from even the back of the club they looked like tiny logs, had some of the most superb soloing prowess. His abilities have been proven over and over to Brubeck in the last 20–odd years, such that Six was given plenty of breathing room to let the giant's creativity bloom in full splendor.

What would a Dave Brubeck show be without the most famous track off of Time Out, "Take Five"? The song, played throughout in 5/4 meter, studied exhausting in high– esteem music schools and conservatories around the world, was played with more energy and fire Thursday night than when it was recorded almost 40 years ago. Randy Jones' drum solo in the song showed he may have been listening to Led Zeppelin's "Moby Dick" lately, being more influenced by than band's late, great drummer John Bonham more than any jazz drummers, as his style was hard–hitting and relentless, driven by rock energy.



Chris Brubeck displayed the genetic passing–on of a great musical mind. He played his trombone the way it was meant to be played — deep, low and moaning. He didn't attempt to be flashy at all and that was a plus. The voice of the bass trombone added a soulful ingredient to the whole mix.

Thursday night, Brubeck showed that after half a century of a professional music career, he is nowhere near ready to throw in the towel. Brubeck, a senior statesman of jazz and a living legend, is a national treasure.

Hebron split as tension mounts

By Hilary Appelman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — U.S. envoy Dennis Ross shuttled between Jerusalem and the Palestinians' Gaza Strip headquarters Sunday, trying to finesse a deal to start an overdue Israeli withdrawal from Hebron.

With warnings of violence multiplying from Jewish settlers in the West Bank town and from Islamic militants, both sides were anxious to reach agreement soon.

Ross and the Israelis reported progress; the Palestinians said substantive differences remain.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat met with Ross on Sunday night, and both Palestinian sources and Shai Bazak, a spokesman for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, said after the meeting that agreement did not appear imminent.

Ross made no comment after the meeting. But he suggested earlier that a new deal on the months-overdue pullback agreed to by Israel's previous government could be delayed if Arafat goes ahead with plans to leave Monday on a week-long trip to Europe.

Netanyahu has promised to honor the earlier agreement, but wants more security for the 450 Jewish settlers in Hebron. The Palestinians have said his demands would require unacceptable changes to the agreement.

Netanyahu also met Sunday with Jewish settlers from Hebron in an effort to blunt their anger over the emerging deal, which would replace most Israeli troops in the city with armed Palestinian police. Hebron, the last West Bank city under Israeli control, is home to 94,000 Palestinians.

Two settlers in the tense city who said they thought they were being attacked with rocks and bottles fired a burst of pistol shots into a Palestinian building on Sunday. Bullets shattered the window of a dentist's office — one whizzed past the dentist's head and lodged in the wall.

Israeli police arrested the settlers.

Baruch Marzel, a settler leader in Hebron, said that when the redeployment takes place: "There will be no way to prevent bloodshed."

"It is just a matter of time," he told The Associated Press. "We are preparing for our defense."

Marzel also suggested what many fear - that settlers might try to sabotage the pullout. "There are 1,000 ways for us to explode the agreement," he said.

Unrelated threats by leaders of the militant group Islamic Jihad have only added to the volatile atmosphere. The group has warned it will carry out attacks to avenge the assassination a year ago of their leader, Fathi Shikaki. Israel is widely believed to have killed Shikaki.

"Our attacks may be delayed because of technical reasons, but they will never be stopped," Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, leader of the Islamic Jihad, told Associated Press Television in Beirut. Ross's meetings Sunday with Netanyahu and Arafat capped a three-week effort by the American mediator to advance the Hebron talks.

"It is clear that we have further narrowed the differences that exist, but we have not overcome those differences," Ross said. "I believe the differences can be overcome."

But Jibril Rajoub, chief of the Palestinian security forces in the West Bank, told the AP that four substantive issues remained unresolved:

— Israel's demand that Palestinian police in Hebron carry only pistols and not automatic rifles;

— Israel's demand for the right to "hot pursuit" of terrorists into Palestinian autonomous zones;

— Israel's opposition to the opening of Martyrs Street, a main thoroughfare and market area in the center of Hebron; and — how to conduct joint Israeli-Palestinian patrols.

Inequalities spur riot

By Will Lester
Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — It is sleepy St. Petersburg to some, a quiet retiree haven trying to land new businesses and such high-profile plums as the vice-presidential debate.

But south of the city's Central Avenue is the other St. Petersburg: angry and seething neighborhoods where young blacks can't find jobs and police are openly jeered and cursed.

The city has been seared by two riots in the last 18 years, both prompted by the shooting deaths of black men by white police officers. The death of 18-year-old Tyron Lewis last Thursday resulted in a rampage that injured 11 and burned 28 buildings. "This goes deeper than just a shooting," Ernest Fillyau, one of two blacks on the City Council, said as he broke into sobs. "This incident hurts."

On the street corner where Lewis was killed, young people carried signs Friday that read "Stop the Genocide" and "You can't kill us all." As police with bullhorns told youths to clear the street, young black men screamed obscenities into the open windows of police cruisers.

"Why do the young blacks keep getting shot and killed?" asked resident Joe King, quivering with rage. "Lots of these kids have guns. Somebody's going to get killed."

St. Petersburg has changed since 1978, when a riot followed the police shooting of Willie James Daniels not far from where Lewis died.

There were no black members of the city council then, no high-ranking black police officers and the grand jury that found the Daniels' shooting an "excusable homicide" was all-white. The city has become more racially integrated, and a whole generation of children has attended racially mixed schools. There are more blacks in positions of power in local business and politics.

About 20 percent of the city's 240,000 residents are black and 15 percent of the police force is black, a much higher percgntage than before. In 1978, police Chief Ernest Curtsinger was fired amid racial discrimination charges against his department.

Yet the neighborhood where the rioting broke out lags well behind the rest of the city economically and feelings of unequal treatment linger.

More than 96 percent of the residents there are black and the median household income of $14,000 is well below the $23,577 annual average for the city. Thirty-seven percent of the residents lived below the federal poverty level — more than twice as much as the rest of the city.

"I thought we were making progress," said Councilwoman Connie Kone, who is white. "So many people worked so hard. Now it's back to ground zero."

A poll conducted a day after the riot found that 37 percent of black residents said discrimination against them has increased in the past five years. Only 19 percent gave that answer during a similar poll in 1980.

Suncoast Opinion Surveys, a research division of the St. Petersburg Times, conducted the telephone survey of 78 blacks and 154 whites. It has a margin of error of six percentage points. Forty-one percent of blacks also said police discriminate against them, the poll found, while nine percent of whites agree that blacks are victims of police discrimination.

10. The Huskies improved to 17–1.

Hixon tried to force UConn to make the errors, having her team sit back and watch the development a bit, but the Huskies were just too strong on the day.

"I made a decision to sit back and try to play them like we played North Carolina, just to see what they would do," Hixon said. "Their tactic against us was just smack it and play for a lot of touches and loose balls."

The Huskies didn't make many mistakes, but they did force a few on the Massachusetts defense.

Connecticut lit the scoreboard up first, tallying a goal off a penalty corner situation with 28:44 remaining in the first half. Jessica Intemann deflected Rose Aspelin's initial shot and sent the ball high into the upper left corner of the net, after UMass goalie Hilary Rose had gone to the ground to block the initial hit.

The Minutewomen retaliated just over two minutes later, as Kyle Rothenberger netted the only UMass tally of the day. After Rothenberger's first shot on the corner was blocked by UConn goalie Tricia Betts, a scramble ensued in front of the net. Sharon Hughes controlled the ball long enough to feed Rothenberger, who sent the score into the Husky cage with 26:26 remaining before halftime.

Rothenberger had a tremendous shot at the UConn net from at the top of the circle with just over 15 minutes left in the half, but quick work by Aspelin led to the defensive save.

Wendy Brady scored the game winner for the Huskies with 9:14 to go in the half, knocking home an unassisted tally.

That was all UConn needed to put UMass away, but it appeared, at least for a few minutes, that the Huskies would have an insurance goal in their pockets. With 27:19 remaining in the game, a Connecticut goal was called back because of a discrepancy in the officials' calls.

"[The near] umpire had signalled that [the ball] hit a foot, the other umpire saw it come off a stick," Hixon said. "Knowing what this umpire saw I just wanted to get them to talk about it. I thought it was a good call."

UConn's speed, along with their strong stickwork, was a deciding factor in the game.

"This is probably the quickest team that we've played overall, and they just outran our backs," Hixon said. "Their moves to the ball and moves into space were much quicker than us."

Sophomore defender Laura Phelan caused a small scare in among the UMass crowd when took a deflected ball in the mouth in the second half, causing a cut in her lip which needed stitches.

Fillion by new coach Tim Whiteside for violating team rules.

The Minutemen could not take advantage of any freshman jitters on Friday, and basically could not take advantage of anything, as they came out on the Tully Forum ice as cold as the surface they skated on.

All in all, Lowell took advantage, coming out of the locker room in full stride, led by the scoring of senior tri– captain Ryan Sandholm (goal and assist) and junior Shannon Basaraba (2 goals).

For UMass coach Joe Mallen, he did not see too many positives on either end of the ice for his team, and tried to look on the bright side of life.

"The only good news is that we have 24 hours to come back and play again," Mallen said. "I just don't think we played with enough effort and intensity, and I think we were outworked by UMass–Lowell tonight. We had a lot of guys who just did not show up and play tonight."

The mission to win the one–on–one battles, get more shots on goal, clear out better in front of their own net, and just work harder was evident on Saturday for the Minutemen. But Lowell was the first to get on the board, as Sandholm, with an assist from junior defenseman Mike Nicholishen, scored just 6:04 into the period on the first of two power play goals for the River Hawks.

UMass could have let up after the three unanswered goals in two nights that Lowell had scored on junior goaltender Brian Regan (56 saves on the weekend), but instead came right back. The top two lines for UMass came through, as they in turn scored three unanswered goals themselves, all in the space of four minutes.

After some good offensive pressure on the Lowell net in the eighth minute, with freshman Jeff Blanchard, junior co– captain Rob Bonneau and senior center Warren Norris in a four–on–four situation, UMass made its presence known about five minutes later. Bonneau tied the game up, finding some skating space and then the five–hole on Fankhouser at the 12:28 mark, on a slap shot from the top of the left faceoff circle. On Friday, the small ice surface of Tully Forum, and the tight checking of Lowell, seemed to keep the top line for UMass in check, but Bonneau was able to move wide and get his shot off.

Assists went to Norris and freshman defenseman Dean Stork, as Bonneau was sent in untouched by a crushing body check near center ice by Norris on Nicholishen.

Just 23 seconds later, the Minutemen capitalized on another four–on–four situation. Junior defenseman Brad Norton did his best imitation of former Bruin great Cam Neely, cutting to the front of the net, and scoring on a low back–hander to make the score 2–1. Bonneau and Norris picked up the assists, as the score was the product of good board work to the right of Fankhouser.

At the 16:21 mark, the second line of Dean Campanale, Dan Juden and Chris Fawcett got the eventual gamewinner for UMass, as it took advantage of a botched Lowell breakout in the River Hawk zone. Juden picked up the loose puck at the center of the blue line, deftly maneuvered past a defender, dished a pass cross–ice to Fawcett, who scored the bang–bang play to Fankhouser's left, and UMass was left with the 3–1 score.

As a whole, this line was the offensive catalyst for the Minutemen on the weekend, as it combined for three of UMass' six goals. For UMass to attain success this season, this line must give the first line offensive support, and Fawcett and his linemates did their part this weekend.

The junior forward saw the difference in UMass between the two games, and he thinks that it all came down to space.

"I just think it was kind of different playing on a smaller rink versus our rink," Fawcett said. "All the forwards just got bunched up [in Lowell], and we just did not get the job done."

For Mallen, the battle is on for the Alumni Cup, but it will not be decided until the rubber match Feb. 8 at Tully Forum. He feels confident after Saturday's display, but the team will have to figure out the mystery of Tully.

"I think that they were two completely opposite games, and we felt that we did not come out and play hard enough [Friday] night," Mallen said. "As opposed to [Saturday], as I thought we got off to a real good start, played real thorough and a physical game, with a lot of speed.

"I think each rink favored the home team in this series, and the small rink favored Lowell and their style."

Seniors lead the way in final UM home game

Each senior contributes in crucial weekend pair of Atlantic 10 victories

By Chris Krein
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team did not need extra incentive going into Sunday's showdown with Duquesne. The game was already a must win situation for the Minutemen, as the race for the four Atlantic 10 post-season spots tightened up considerably after Friday's action.

The team notched a big 2–0 win over St. Bonaventure on Friday, and on Sunday at noon, the stands at Richard F. Garber field were teeming with fans hungry for a UMass victory against the Dukes. The players had motivation enough it seemed to come out fired up for the game but an extra element increased the stakes. It was Senior Day at Garber Field.

In the end, a pair of seniors would score the two goals that propelled UMass to a 2– 0 blanking of Duquesne. The victory keeps UMass in the middle of the A–10 dogfight, upping its conference record to 7–3–0.

The six players who would hear their names announced for the last time on their home field sprinted onto the pitch to applause from their teammates and fans, as their careers were recapped over the P.A. system. One by one, Joe Jacobson, Dan Chagnon, Dave Siljanovski, Lee Marlow, Tobias Bremke and Tashi Tshering took their place alongside the other members of the starting squad.

"It was a great day for the seniors," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "The seniors walked off on a winning note, which is nice."

In the four years this group has been together, the team has amassed a 47–26–4 record. They captured the school's only A–10 regular season title in 1994 and advanced to the conference title game. The 1995 team tied a school record with 15 wins and returned to the A–10 Championship game. This year's squad is aiming to not just play the championship game, but win it and get a chance to go to the NCAA tournament.

The inspired play of the senior six on Sunday brought an era to a close, as each player made contributions to bring their goal closer to actuality.

Marlow tallied the first goal of the game, 3:40 into the first half. It was his first score of the year, coming in his first start this season. Marlow has been hampered with injuries during the 1996 campaign and has seen limited action. The Harvard native improved his collegiate career stats with the game winner to 35 games, six goals, two assists and 13 points.

Co–captains Dan Chagnon and Joe Jacobson, have shut down some of the most dangerous A–10 scoring threats this season. It was an added plus then to see them in the middle of key offensive situations during the game as well.

Jacobson nailed home the second Minuteman goal of the afternoon as he gathered a deflected throw in and knocked home his first tally of the year. Jacobson is a defensive specialist, considered to be one of the best marking backs in New England.

The other senior in the backfield, Chagnon, had an excellent opportunity to score his first goal on the year. He took a penalty shot at the 55 minute mark, trying to complete the senior scoring trifecta. His kick was stuffed by the Dukes' keeper as Chagnon came up empty.

Chagnon's importance is on the other side of the ball, however, assigned to keep the other team from scoring.

Butler reflected on how important Chagnon is to the team. "He is our most valuable asset. He is a leader... and probably has the most heart on the team," he said.

Although Tobias Bremke is not a senior, he logged in his final minutes on the home turf as well. Bremke is returning home to Marienfeld, Germany following the season. He has played 20 career games for the maroon and white, starting in 11 of them.

"I enjoyed playing [Garber Field is one of the best fields in the A–10. It's a great atmosphere," he said.

Also lamenting his final appearance on the home field was senior midfielder Tashi Tshering.

"It was very emotional," he replied. " It's been a great place and I have some good memories. I'm really going to miss this field."

Although he came into the season without any career points, Tshering chalked up his first ones earlier this season with a goal against Holy Cross in a 5–0 win. His biggest score though, was the game-winner against St. Joseph's on the road in September.

However, it is Dave Siljanovski who's offensive prowess will be missed the most. The College Sports magazine preseason All–American from Pompton Lakes, N.J. stands as one of the most prolific scorers in UMass history. He is in the top five in all three offensive categories, ranking fifth in career goals with 30, first in career assists with 26, and one point out of third place with 86 career points. Additionally, he was a First Team All–Atlantic Ten in 1994 and 1995. He also holds the record for most goals (12) and assists (17) in a single season. The 1–2 combination with Mike Butler has been a dangerous threat to all opponents for the past three years.

"I've enjoyed playing with him," Butler said. "It's just an honor playing with him. "

"These have been the best four years of my life. All these guys are like brothers to me," Siljanovski said.

This group of seniors has compiled some impressive accomplishments, but it will seem diminished if they are unable to extend their drive past the final regular season match-up at URI on Nov. 2.

Siljanovski is keeping open the hope for one more game at Garber Field though.

"If we win next Saturday and the A–10 Tournament, we could have another game back here," he said.

whistle against the Dukes, UMass was nothing short of intense on the field. After taking both matches 2–0, the Minutemen (10–5–1, 7–3–0 A–10) have to play a waiting game this week.

The two UMass wins eliminated tournament host Dayton from stepping onto their own pitch on Nov. 8, as the 5–3 Flyers are out of the race with the two Minutemen wins. UMass has to ride out the week and see how LaSalle (6–2–1 A–10), Virginia Tech (6–3–0 A–10) and Fordham (5–3–0) fared on the weekend. UMass faces No. 1 Rhode Island next weekend on the road to wrap up the regular season.

"We just have to get on the bus to Rhode Island now," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We'll have to see how the other games went today and see how we are. We've won three of our last four games, we have one more to play and we'll see what happens."

UMass 2, Duquesne 0

Team work was the name of the game in UMass' blanking of Duquesne (4–8–3, 2–6–2 A–10) yesterday. The shut out on the field was not just another step toward Dayton and the A– 10 Tourney, but also marked the final regular season appearance on Garber for six Minutemen. Call it coincidence, but both game winning goals came from seniors.

In his first start of the season, senior Lee Marlow set the pace, notching a quick goal less than four minutes into the match. Marlow finished off a cross by sophomore Carmelo Garcia from five yards out on the heels of first–class ball movement, as the Minutemen worked the ball up both sides of the field on the strike.

Adding to the memory of the day, Marlow's goal marks his first of the season.

"I'm happy for Marlow," Koch said. "He's struggled with injuries this year and hasn't been able to do what he did last year."

"It was very nice, especially after being out most of the season and being hurt," Marlow said. "It was good to go out there today and contribute something."

UMass struck again at 39:41 when senior Joe Jacobson got his head on a throw in by sophomore Paul Corcoran which was deflected by a Duquesne defender to give the Minutemen the win.

"Joey has been knocking on the door all season," Koch said. "It was a great run and he was in the right spot at the right time. I give him all the credit on that one. He timed his run perfectly, the ball was right there and he put it home."

The men in maroon and white almost got a third goal from yet another senior when Dan Chagnon was inches away from scoring his first career goal. The shot was awarded when junior Mike Butler was taken down from behind by a Duquesne back.

UMass put on a defensive clinic in the second frame as the Dukes didn't get a shot on Minuteman keeper Jeff Jablonski until the last 15 minutes of the game.

"We did a good job closing players down and not letting them turn," Koch said. "Our midfield picked it up a little bit better than we have been, I can't complain."

UMass 2, St. Bonaventure 0

Ball movement was the key to the win against the Bonnies.

"When we moved the ball from side to side quickly, they couldn't adjust," Koch said. "When we held it, they got behind the ball very well. You have to give them credit, they made it hard to play."

The first shutout of the weekend came on the merits of another two-goal performance by junior Joenal Castma. The St. John's transfer got his first goal of the day when Chagnon threaded a perfect ball through the St. Bonaventure defense, where a breaking Castma finished with a one–touch shot from 15 yards out.

The UMass forward stuck again at the 65 minute mark. Sophomore Jon Hanna, who peppered crosses through the St. Bonaventure defense from the 18–yard line all day, sent a rocket of a ball to the far post. Bonnie keeper Rob Vartughian tipped the ball up over his head, where Castma was poised to finish.

Castma, along with Butler, exploded across the midfield giving the opposing backs a run for their money. The Castma–Butler combo was in full force, as senior forward Dave Siljanovski didn't dress for the match due to yellow cards.

"Mike Butler challenged the ball in the box and set up the second goal," Koch said. "Joenal finished two nice goals. We needed him to score today and he did."

For now, the team has the week to prepare for Rhode Island.

"We have to make sure our midfield is defensively sound and we have to make sure have guys on the back post on our offensive chances," Koch said. "I'm confident. We have a whole week to prepare and recover from this [weekend]."

Women's soccer crashes through Temple bunker

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team was prepared to go to war against Temple and its vaunted bunker defense on Saturday at Richard F. Garber Field. Coach Jim Rudy stopped short of calling his buddies at Reebok and ordering camouflage battle fatigues — saying that he'd save those for the University of Miami football team — but made it clear that Saturday's match would be a battle nonetheless.

Last year, Temple utilized the bunker tactic, which includes keeping at least 10 players within 18 yards of the goal on a UMass offensive possession, and beat the Minutewomen 1–0 in Philadelphia, still UMass' only loss ever in an Atlantic 10 match. Tactically, the bunker defense is the equivalent of the trench warfare practiced in France during the first World War.

Temple field general Seamus Mc Williams told Rudy on many occasions that he planned to employ the same strategy for Saturday's contest and even before the season, Rudy was busy in the Boyden War Room, preparing his troops.

"Seamus said already that he's going to play the same bunker defense and lock up the shop, close the doors," he said in August. "Rumor has it that this year he's bringing shovels, pitch forks, barbed wire and machine gun placements. We'll be prepared for the bunker."

That the Minutewomen were on Saturday, making Temple's bunker defense the weakest containment strategy since Peter McNeely's fabled cocoon of horror.

UMass blasted Temple with five goals on Saturday, and if Rudy had taken his team through military training in preparation, it was likely with the 81st Airborne Division of the U.S. Army, who's motto is "Death from above."

The Minutewomen avoided the log jam that is the Temple bunker not by calling out the heavy artillery and plowing through it with a Patton–esque full–frontal assault, but rather by delicately lofting balls over the Owl defenders and looking for heads and redirections of the long–range bombs.

An aerial bombing like the one the Fanatic Forty witnessed on Saturday would have left the Temple goal mouth looking like the Ho Chi Minh Trail, had any explosives been placed inside the game balls.

The schematics of the UMass attack involved pushing the ball to the brink of the enemy lines, and then kicking it back to their defenders. As the scarlet–clad Owls marched upfield to attack the defenders (who tallied four assists and a goal in the match), Rudy had apparently given the orders straight out of the Battle of Bunker Hill: "Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes."

At the last moment, UMass defenders, or midfielders on the flank, launched the ball like a projectile into Temple territory, over the drawn–up bunker and to awaiting forwards. Four of UMass' five goals against Temple came either directly on an aerial cross, or as the result of one.

"The incongruous part of that method of a play is you bunker in order to deny space, but when you clear out you create space in which to play again," Rudy said of the bunker. "It's a dichotomy. We'd knock it out and there was no pressure on the ball, so could take our time and pick [how to play the ball].

"As time went by, we went through it, around it and over it."

In terms of the UMass side's all–time unbeaten A–10 mark, last year's match at Temple Stadium was a Dunkirk or Waterloo for the troops from the Pioneer Valley.

With a well engineered scheme, and players who executed it with both patience in the back and aggression up front, UMass emerged victorious as Saturday became V–T day at Garber Field.

With the team's NCAA hopes treading on thin ice, the bunker was not the 1996 Minutewomen's last stand.

Iverson, in Lightning–esque fashion, saw it as a team goal, and she was only at the right place at the right time.

"Sometimes we get impatient, we try to force things into [the bunker], go over the top a lot, and we just have to be patient and wait for our channels to come through," Iverson said. "We tried to open up the right side, leave a lot of space towards the corners, and her shot to the top corner of the near post was just saved by keeper Kelly O'Neill. With time running away in the half, she hooked up with Kurowski and senior Amy Powell on another example of beautiful ball movement, but was once again wide left on her goal bid.

"I guess I had more chances than I normally have, and I got a little frustrated, but I really wanted to sink one," Magid said. "The coach just told me in these two days to get a little more forward, and take more shots, and I tried to do that. I felt [the bunker] was tough because once we got in the final third, there was just no room to do anything.

"Our frontrunners and midfield packed in, plus we had the defensive backs making their runs, so it was getting a little jammed."

A unenigmatic second half ensued, as nothing went either the Lady Dukes' or the Minutewomen's way. The best opportunity of the half came when Lightning served a low cross from the right flank, and Kurowski could not beat O'Neill to the ball. But 70:37 into the match, the offensive pall over Garber lifted, and junior Erica Iverson broke the bunker's back with her loose ball score in Duquesne's goal mouth, making the final 1–0.

■ women's soccer

halftime about getting it cleaned up, and we gave up more corners in one half than we did in most games. As time went by, we went through [the bunker], around it and over it."

But Lightning did not only strike once for the UMass, but twice in the first frame, as the team got on the board with her first goal of the day at the 9:19 mark. Fellow seniors Sandy Shimogaki and Erin Lynch assisted on that goal, while Shimogaki got into the giving spirit again 19:50 later, as she and freshman forward Emma Kurowski tripped the end line fantastic to feed Lightning on another tap–in goal.

But steadily through the game, UMass began to play Temple's offside trap well, with senior Julie Magid and Lynch coming off the flanks to both serve and create scoring opportunities. Don moved up to the offense on corner kicks, and the team began to dominate.

For Rudy, he was glad his London import was not out for afternoon tea on Saturday, and saw her hat trick — the first by a Minutewoman since Rebecca Myers' dismantling of Fordham last season — as the catalyst.

"[Tina] was very solid, very opportunistic, jumped on a knockdown early on and that ball was only loose by about three inches," Rudy said. "That sort of got us going, and I was hoping she would get a hat–trick."

In the land where Lightning struck, she put all the credit to her teammates.

"The team worked hard, and you have to give the credit to the whole team," Lightning said. "We played really well today, and we have always known that once we get one, we can relax and play our game and the rest will follow."

On Sunday, the Lady Dukes were expected to give at least a little more of an opposing force, as they came into Amherst with a borderline .500 record. The bunker was the backbone for Duquesne on this day as well, but the thing is they did it as well, if not better, than Temple. The offensive opportunities were plentiful for UMass, but the last shot/pass to finish them off were not in abundance.

Magid was the center of the offense early, as at the 12:49 mark she made a run down the left side of the box, out maneuvered two defenders, and her shot to the top corner of the near post was just saved by keeper Kelly O'Neill. With time running away in the half, she hooked up with Kurowski and senior Amy Powell on another example of beautiful ball movement, but was once again wide left on her goal bid.

Volleyball notches huge win over Rhody; UMass ends Rams' 12–match win streak

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

It's official — the recruits have arrived.

The Massachusetts volleyball team, led by freshmen Jill Meyers and Sarah Watters, handed the first–place Rhode Island Rams their first loss in the Atlantic 10 conference, and ended their 12–match winning streak Friday night, 3–1.

UMass coach Bonnie Kenny no doubt figured these types of wins would come, but with such a young team (half the starting lineup are freshmen), she didn't imagine they'd arrive this soon.

"I'm very happy," she said. "We competed better tonight than we have all season long. And the prize sure was on [URI]. We played very, very hard. And it was a total team effort."

For the Rams, everything was going as planned after game one, which they took, 15–12. But UMass (18–6, 7–4 A–10) stormed out in game two and claimed a 7–0 lead before winning, 15–4. The last two matches in Curry Hicks Cage ended 17–15 and 15–11. The win avenges a 3–0 loss to Rhode Island on September 20.

Twenty–four kills from Meyers marked a (short–lived) career–high, while Watters' 21 was also her best this season. What's more, fellow freshman Kari Hogancamp, a middle blocker, notched 25 digs, also a career–high, to go along with 10 kills.

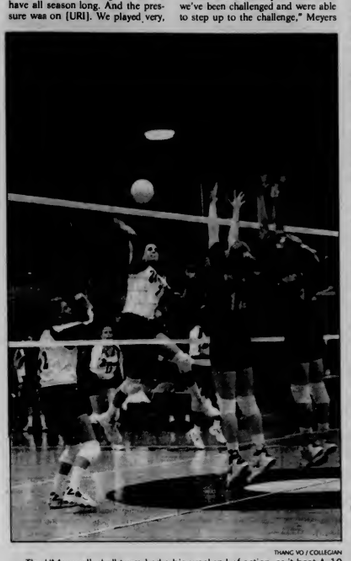
"This was definitely the first time we've been challenged and were able to step up to the challenge," Meyers said. "As a team we never relaxed, everyone was always into it. You always go into a match thinking you're going to win but this one was great."

Although game one showed the Rams they had a fight on their hands, and game two showed UMass wouldn't be satisfied with the proverbial "good effort", game three marked the turning point. The teams exchanged several serves and leads before an 11–11 tie. Then things looked gloomy as URI scored two quick points for a 13–11 lead, causing Kenny to call for a time–out.

At first, it was useless, as the Rams (19–6, 10–1 A–10) made it 14–11. But three points later, it was the visitors calling time. With the score deadlocked at 14, URI managed a sideout, and then a point. However, three straight Meyers kills gave her team a 16–15 lead, before it actually won a serve later.

"We were able to play with them, point for point," Kenny said. "This gives us a lot of confidence. I just hope this team maintains the intensity down the road. I know it can do well."

Senior outside hitter Dionne Nash managed 15 kills and 18 digs for the Minutewomen, while sophomore Katie Pearce directed the Minutewomen attack with 73 assists, which marked her second consecutive match with more than 70 assists.



The clincher, game four, was an impressive win for UMass. Down 6–0, its first point came on a Pearce ace. Then, it looked like there would be no comeback at all, as URI made it 7–1. But about five minutes later another Pearce ace made it 7–5. Later on, a Watters kill made it 8–7, URI.

Eventually, a Pearce/Watters block tied things at 11. That marked the third of seven straight points for the Minutewomen.

Rhode Island came out flat in the first game, and let the Minutewomen go up, 7–2. The Rams made numerous unforced errors before settling down and taking an 8–7 advantage. UMass never regained the lead, though they came close at 13–12.

Game two was never close. Aside from 7–0, other Massachusetts leads included 8–1, 10–2 and 13–4.

"At the beginning of the game we knew we had a shot," Watters said. "This week we didn't concentrate on them too much, we just went over some tape. We were ready for whatever they had. This was the best [part of the season]. Everyone played hard, and it paid off."

The UMass volleyball team had a big weekend of action, as it beat A–10 foe Rhode Island to end URI's 12–game win streak.

the grass at Cowell Stadium.

But the Minutemen had trouble with their footing in the first quarter. Tailback Frank Alessio slipped three times on the wet turf in the first half, and the UMass defense had trouble rushing Breshnahan due to the conditions.

The Minutemen had no success offensively in the first half. UMass never got past the Wildcats 42–yard line, despite having the ball for 16:48. Drive after drive would stall, as the UNH defense swarmed the Minutemen, stifling their game plan.

Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith struggled, completing only 2–of–11 passes for 22 yards in the first half. The Minutemen would gain only 110 total yards in the first two quarters, while UNH would rack up 288 yards before halftime.

UNH would increase its lead early in the second quarter. Pinned back at the UMass four–yard line, the Wildcats would chew up both the clock and the Minutemen, marching 96 yards on 18 plays in 6:38. UNH running back Dave Lopez punched it in from four yards out on a third and goal, and with 12:44 left in the first half, the Minutemen found themselves down 12–0. UNH failed to convert a two–point conversion.

With the Minuteman offense dormant, the Wildcats pushed their lead late in the first half. With 32 seconds left, Breshnahan threw his second TD of the half, an 11–yard strike to wideout Al Barrow, and after UNH completed a two–point conversion, UMass found itself down 20–0 heading into the locker room.

" At 20–0, you've still got a chance," Hodges said. "We tried, but obviously it didn't work."

The second half was worse for the Minutemen. The Wildcats booted two field goals in the first eight minutes of the third quarter, boosting their lead to 26–0. UMass would punt twice and throw an interception in the third quarter, and UNH put the game safely out of reach with 3:10 left in the third. Jones's second touchdown reception of the day, a six–yarder, gave the Wildcats a 33–0 lead.

UMass would finally score early in the fourth quarter. Ron Brockington capped off a ten–play, 70–yard drive with a five–yard touchdown that cut the lead to 33–7.

UNH could do no wrong Saturday. The Wildcats racked up 580 yards of total offense, 320 of which came on the ground. Leading the charge was sophomore tailback Jerry Azumah. The YanCon's leading rusher gained 210 yards on 25 carries, and was awarded the Bill Knight trophy, given to the annual UMass–UNH game MVP. Breshnahan threw at will all day, completing 18–of–28 passes for 260 yards and three touchdowns.

"I don't think there's any question that we played our best football game of the year," UNH coach Bill Bowes said. "I was very concerned about UMass coming in here and running the football on us because they've been doing it all year, but I was glad to see our defense step it up."

to the game's Most Valuable Player award, given each year to a player after the UMass–UNH game.

It just wasn't meant to be for the Minutemen, who were looking to start off the four final conference games of the season with a win. They instead dropped their second Yankee Conference game of the year and fell to 5–3 overall. The loss drops them into a tie with the Wildcats in the New England division of the conference at 3–2.

With only three games left, they will need a strong finish to the year if they want to keep their Yankee Conference and post–season hopes alive. UMass has not reached the post–season since 1990.

"We lost to a very good football team today," UMass coach Mike Hodges said. "They were obviously ready to play and played very very well. For some reason we didn't play very well. We've got beat at every phase of the football game."

The game was highly uncharacteristic of the Minutemen in that the Wildcats were having big plays at UMass' expense all day long, and the offense of UMass couldn't manage to move the ball up the field whatsoever.

"We didn't make any plays all day, there was anything from an offensive or a defensively stand point that we did well today," Hodges said. "We were not ready to play from a mental standpoint, and obviously you can't do that against that outfit, because they're a very, very good football team."

The Minutemen only averaged 2.8 yards per play, most of which can be atributed to the offensive play calling. UMass felt that running eight designed quarterback keepers and 10– plus option plays was the best way to be effective.

The Wildcats didn't think so however, and they smelled out virtually every play, stopping the Minutemen for losses on the day totaling 24 yards. UMass gained 139 yards on the ground, not bad for an individual effort, but as a team, it doesn't get the job done.

All three of UMass' normally overpowering running backs, Frank Allesio, Matt Jordan and Ron Brockington, were held in check, with each gaining only 29 yards apiece, all with double digit carries.

The air attack belonged to the Wildcats as well, as quarterback Chris Bresnhan threw for 260 yards on 18–for– 28 passing and three touchdowns. His prime target was Azumah, who had six catches for 82 yards and one TD. Along with one kickoff return, Azumah amassed a total of 307 all purpose yards on the day.

Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith for UMass was 6–for–19 for only 53 yards and two interceptions. Freshman Ralphael Quinn caught four of those completions for 26 yards. It was another facet of the game though, that did not show the usual way UMass has performed throughout the season.

"We've got to evaluate what were doing, and I think we have to evaluate the way we prepared to come up here today cause obviously it didn't work," Hodges said. "I said that all along, even in the first game, I felt that we were ready to play from a mental standpoint, but for us to play like that, obviously we were not ready to play today, we were not ready to play."

Unfortunately, this is not the most opportune time for UMass to not be ready to play in a game, as it will have no time to ponder this loss. The team will have to think forward to the next three games, which see the Minutemen play two more ranked opponents, all in conference.

This game had UMass reverting to old mistakes, ones it appeared to have put behind it in the last couple of games. The Minutemen had two lost fumbles, two interceptions, five penalties, and two sacks given up.

Don't be mistaken though, this football team has a lot of character, as it has shown throughout the season. After dropping the first game of the season 50–14 to Villanova, the Minutemen came back to win three in a row.

Then after losing a 41–20 contest to URI, the Minutemen came back to win the next two games, in which they scored 40–plus points.

The Minutemen can only hope that will be the case once again this coming weekend, as they play conference opponent Maine at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20
Give your full attention to your surroundings today. You could be a source of distraction for someone else if you're not extra careful. A small gesture you make this week could return to you tenfold.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
Your intuition into a loved one's feelings reaches almost telepathic proportions this week. Use this insight to your sweetheart's advantage—especially if they're feeling blue. Your efforts could make a huge difference.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
Things at work may seem a little frantic, with questions bombarding you from every side. Feel free to step back and find the right answer, rather than just any answer. Also, listen carefully for extra insight into one problem in particular.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
When things are going smoothly for you, consider giving a friend a little extra attention. A little patience and friendliness could alter their perspective in a way they'll never forget. Ask the right questions.

LEO
July 23–August 23
Your outgoing nature wins you many friends, but this week you may find it hard to sit still. Listen to a quiet friend's wisdom and then put it into action in an unexpected way for the best results.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22
An unusual circumstance leaves you in the position of being able to help a stranger. The rewards will be ample, although they may not all be tangible. Focus on a romantic impulse to win the partner of your dreams.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
A confusing time at home tempts you to overdo at work. Focus on working out the underlying problems. They could be much simpler than they seem. Assert your authority with kindness.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
Follow through on an inspiration for results that could surprise you. Avoid a discussion of an issue that's not germane. Someone who disagrees with your methods could be trying to cloud your judgment.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
This week, a careful, considerate approach to relationships and decisions is wise. Your tactful honesty could help a relationship bloom anew, if you truly have the other person's best interests at heart.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
A lighthearted gesture may be misinterpreted, especially at work. It might be wise to opt for silence, rather than humor. A distant friend might introduce you to someone nearby. Be on the lookout for an opportunity.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18
Rather than explaining why something went wrong, quietly make the effort to fix things. Someone who's interested in seeing how you handle things will be favorably impressed. Spend some time with a younger person.

PISCES
February 19–March 20
Ideas could snowball during a brainstorming session. Be ruthless when you're deciding what things will really work. Don't waste too much energy on a minor problem—it will resolve itself without interference.

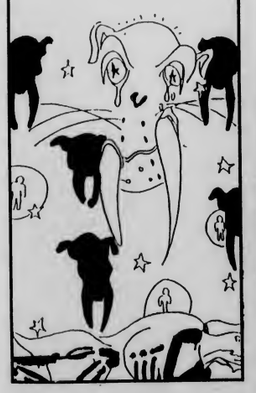
There's been a large walrus in my bedroom for years. He's very very quiet and hardly moves. He just sits there.

I know where he sits all night long.



If I want to grab something in the middle of the night I've taught myself how to reach around him even if I can't see.

I have to use a coded language to explain him to my girlfriends.

The girls are shy and confused about why he's there with us in the room and how he got there in the first place.

I don't know his name because I don't know much about him. When he leaves, my life will fit better..... the world will look differently, and I'll finally know his name.

With my bad luck his name will probably be something like Butch or Sheila Gordon.

Lightning strikes on Owls; Rudy gets 200th vs. DU

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN
Tina Lightning celebrates after scoring a goal in this weekend's Atlantic 10 women's soccer action. Lightning had a hat trick to lift the Minutewomen over Temple and Duquesne.

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Some things change and some things stay the same — this weekend for the Massachusetts women's soccer team (14–2–1, 7–0–1 in the Atlantic 10) was an example of the latter.

More specifically, the Minutewomen got wins over two A–10 opponents, while facing the simplest of team defensive schemes, popularly known as "the bunker." UMass has now faced the bunker defense this season more than you can count on two hands, and with its A-10 schedule, has its figurative grip on it by now.

On Saturday, UMass was able to break the eight–back bunker defense of Temple (3–13, 2–6 A–10), as the offense was led by senior midfielder Tina Lightning's hat trick to a 5–0 obliteration of the Owls.

There was no cruising on Sunday afternoon, as the Lady Dukes of Duquesne (5–6–4, 1–5–2 A–10) took no heed of Senior Day celebrations, and tried to rain on the Minutewomen's parade. Theri efforts were to no avail, as they fell by the slightest of scores, 1–0, in UMass coach Jim Rudy's 200th career victory.

Temple came out strong against UMass, as their 3–12 record coming into the contest was more scary for the Minutewomen than soothing. Their mastery of the bunker defense brought the only loss UMass has ever suffered to an A – 1 0 opponent, last season's 1–0 defeat in Philadelphia. What was scary on this day was the pressure the Owls put on junior keeper Danielle Dion, as they had five corner kicks by the half, which is more than UMass usually gives up in a game.

For Rudy, at the end of the day his team had done the job.

"We got at it pretty good, and we were working on it," Rudy said. "We were real patient with it, and we did enough. This was by no means a pretty game, but a needed game, and we needed this one. We created about four really good ones for them, with back passes and so on.

Hockey gets season–opening split

By Jorma Kansanen

It could have been double the pleasure for the Massachusetts men's hockey team (1–1, 1–1 in Hockey East) this weekend, as not only would its season opener be against intrastate rival Massachusetts–Lowell (1–1, 1–1 HE), but the battle for the Alumni Cup would also be on tap in this home and home series.

Mass - Lowell	5
Massachusetts	2

Last season the Minutemen took the inaugural Cup, which is given to the winner of the season series between the two state campuses, in an exciting contest that was settled in a 5– 4 shootout after overtime.

The season opener on Friday night, though, did not hold the excitement of their last encounter, especially for the Minutemen as they dropped an ugly 5–2 loss at Tully Forum in Billerica to the River Hawks. It was a turn of the tables and venues on Saturday night, as UMass returned to the spacious confines of the Mullins Center, and found more space in between the pads of Lowell freshman goalie Scott Fankhouser in a 4–2 win.

UMass pummelled by UNH in New England showdown

By Luke Meredith

DURHAM N.H. — Oh well, there's always next year.

The Massachusetts football team's dreams of a Yankee Conference championship and playoff berth were put to rest Saturday, as New Hampshire raced out to a 20–0 halftime lead and poured it on in the second half, destroying the Minutemen 40–7 in a Yankee Conference New England Division showdown.

New Hampshire	40
Massachusetts	7

"There was not one thing that we did right today," UMass coach Mike Hodges said. "We weren't ready to play. We have to play well to be competitive, and for some reason, we didn't play well. We've got to evaluate what we're doing, because obviously it didn't work."

This was the biggest game of the year for the Minutemen. Coming in they were 5–2, and with a 3–1 conference mark, they led the New England Division by a game over UNH, who came in at 4–2, 2–2 in the YanCon.

With the loss, UMass drops to 3–2 in the YanCon and is now behind the Wildcats in the division, by virtue of Saturday's disaster in Durham.

UNH wasted no time getting on the board. The Wildcats received the opening kickoff and embarked on a five play, 80–yard drive that would give them the lead only 1:10 into the game. The combo of quarterback Chris Breshnahan and wide receiver Calvin Jones hooked up for 63 yards on this first drive, including a 30–yard touchdown that put the Wildcats up 6–0. The Minutemen blocked the extra point attempt.

Offensively, UMass would spend most of the first half on the ground — literally. The UNH campus received over a foot of rain in the wake of last week's bad weather, and helicopters were brought in late in the week to dry

Old mistakes resurface in N.H.; UMass now tied with Wildcats

DURHAM, N.H. — Mama said there'd be days like this.

Well, Saturday afternoon was one of those days for the Massachusetts football team. The Minutemen suffered a 40–7 humiliation at the hands of the No. 18 University of New Hampshire Wildcats, in a Yankee Conference game in which nothing went UMass' way.

The usually effective defense of the Minutemen, that before had been the vital part of the UMass success, just did not show up on Saturday.

The Minutemen gave up 580 yards of total offense to the Wildcats, 320 yards on the ground — 210 yards of which belonged to sophomore tailback Jerry Azumah, the Yankee Conference's leading rusher.

Azumah most definitely had his way on Saturday, picking up his second 200–yard plus game this year, en route

Going into the weekend, the Atlantic 10 men's soccer standings were at a deadlock. With four teams grinding it out for a tourney berth, the Massachusetts Minutemen needed to knock off both St. Bonaventure and Duquesne in their final regular season homestand to remain in contention for a trip to Dayton.

That trend continued in unfavorable fashion for UMass Saturday in Storrs, Conn. as UConn notched a win over the visiting Minutewomen, 2–1.

I'm writing about Wesleyan U. and their Malcolm X house ["X Marks The House," September 1996]. I think it's a shame that we have regressed back into segregation. Do these students who want an all-black house also want all-black diners and water fountains?

The quote that the Malcolm X house gives them "a place where we don't think about race" made me laugh. How can the junior residence advisor say they need a place where race doesn't matter when it obviously matters very much to them?

Renee Shiflet, senior, Southeast Missouri State U.

You reap what you sow

I was deeply disturbed by the "Generation Hexed" cartoon [September 1996]. This particular cartoon ridiculed a person because they were ... gasp! ... a middle-aged student!

People need to realize that the seeds of bigotry and prejudice can be planted anywhere and these seeds can grow into a bias against any person or culture. Prejudice is not restricted to a few groups or circumstances. If people wish to stop racism, sexism, classism or other forms of prejudice, they must address their own personal biases. Ageism is as detrimental to our society as other forms of prejudice.

Stephen E. Buchalew, copy editor, School of Agric., Pennsylvania State U.

ILLUSTRATION BY SEAN MURRAY, SYRACUSE U.

I found "X Marks The House" very disturbing. I found the problem was a complete contradiction of what the house stands for. A quote from Angie Montgomery reads, "The Malcolm X House gives us a place where we don't think about race. We can be ourselves." If the house is a place where race isn't a concern, why are they so concerned if "non-black" students live there? Shouldn't any form of education be open to people of all nationalities? I hope in the future people can really not think about race instead of saying it to keep their single-race home.

Ever cheated in a class?

Yes: 58%
No: 42%

I have an indirect answer to the question. My dad is a teacher who caught a student cheating in the back of the class. He had his sock and shoe off and his textbook on the floor. He was turning the pages with his bare foot. Kevin Moore, graduate student, Texas Tech • The question "Ever cheated in a class?" was offensive to me. I come from a conservative, Baptist background. I never cheat. Anyone who has needs to be expelled. It's just wrong. Robbie Foster, junior, Middle Tennessee State U. • Hard to believe, but no. I haven't cheated on a test since high school. Shannon, junior, U. of South Carolina • What kind of question is that anyway? Of course! The best ways that I have gotten away with it is to write a small cheat sheet and I've been able to put it under my class ring, in my ear, in my pen top and on my baseball cap bill. I don't think I could ever have passed half the math and science classes I've taken. Nick Anderson, senior, Florida State U. • I haven't cheated at the university, but in high school it was a must. It was the only way I got by. Sasasha Emanuel, freshman, Florida A & M U. • Yes, I have cheated in a class although it has never been off someone else. Just crib notes. DJ Menzel, junior, Louisiana State U. • Yes, I have cheated in class and I will cheat until I graduate from college. Kenya, senior, Norfolk State U., Va. • No, I have never cheated on a test before. Cheating doesn't get you anywhere. All you have to do is study, study, study and you will make it. LaShawn Johnson, freshman, Winthrop College • Yes I have because I'm a business student at USC. Anonymous, U. of Southern California • As far as college, I've never cheated. When I was younger, I was in a competitive honors prgram and I felt compelled to. At that time, it was nothing major. I definitely wouldn't do it again. I know it's wrong, but the peer pressure got to me. Anonymous • I have always figured that the guy or girl sitting next to me had to be as stupid as I was otherwise they would not have been there, so why bother cheating? Jim, grad student, Cleveland State U.

Vegetarian or meat eater?

Vegetarian: 33%
Meat eater: 67%

I'm a proud, full-fledged carnivore. None of this omnivore shit for me. It's meat, meat, meat all the way. I think anyone who just eats vegetables or eats half vegetables needs to be shot. Because the only thing they are doing is promoting agriculture and what does agriculture do? It promotes Southern life and what does that do? It promotes stupidity. And just ... just ... just ... oh hell, oh shoot, oh bloody hell, I need to go eat a steak. Scott Pajavar, junior, Middle Tennessee State U. • Meat eater definitely. Shannon, junior, U. of South Carolina • If there's one thing I know, it's eating. I spent the first 22 years of my life gluttarian (eating anything). Then I spent time vegetarian (no meat), vegan (no meat + dairy), fruitarian (only fruit), liquidarian (only liquids) and breatharian (only air). Also two 20-day water fasts. My recommendation: Choose the purest food and the least amount of it you can. But, most importantly, be happy with what you eat. Ed Peterson, law student, U. of Wisconsin, Madison

Hail to the Chief

When I heard the news that our publisher and editorial director, Gayle Morris Sweetland, had passed away Sept. 17, I couldn't believe it. Yes, she had been battling cancer for two and a half years, so you might think it shouldn't have come as a shock. But you didn't know Gayle. She was one hell of a tough broad (her own words) who refused to lose a fight.

Even little things that didn't seem to matter to others took on great importance to Gayle and were worth fighting for. Believe me, we had our share of battles over the most minute details in this magazine — a comma here, a caption there. But this was her baby, and Gayle wanted the magazine to be perfect. She wanted it to be informative but also fun to read. I remember her telling me soon after I was hired in 1994, "We can be irreverent. We can be controversial. We can be funny. But we can never ever be boring."

Actually, if Gayle knew I was writing this column, she'd probably be screaming down the hallway, "What the hell is this crap?! Who wants to read about some old broad? Either get rid of it or find some way to make it funny!"

For someone who never took a journalism class in college and had never had a bylined article appear in a publication, Gayle's influence on the field of journalism will be felt for years and years to come. Even though she lost the fight for her life, she didn't lose the battle to help struggling student journalists get their start in publishing.

Since 1991, when Gayle bought U. Magazine, hundreds of student writers, photographers and artists have beefed up their portfolios with freelance work for U. Magazine. And some 30 graduating college journalists have come from all around the nation to our Los Angeles headquarters to be assistant editors.

Following their yearlong fellowships, these bright and talented journalists have gone on to jobs at Entertainment Weekly, Spy, Teen, PC World, ComputerLife, People and various newspapers and broadcast news stations. And U.'s future assistant editors will continue to take a bit of the Gayle brand of journalism (irreverent, controversial, funny, but never boring) into their future jobs.

Gayle's commitment to helping college journalists doesn't stop there. The Gayle Morris Sweetland Scholarship Fund has been established at the U. of Michigan.

It makes me sad that these students will never get the chance to know Gayle — the bionic publisher who could leap tall editors in a single bound, as we wrote about her on our Web site.

We will miss her terribly. But Gayle, you can rest assured, you will never be forgotten.

A Kappa Alpha fraternity member learned a hard lesson when his new American Express card was stolen from the frat house mailbox while he was out of town for the weekend. (Guess he shouldn't have left home without it.) The thief wasted no time and charged $450. All evidence points to one telltale suspect: a weekend house guest who bought and consumed an astonishing amount of pizza. Way to cover your tracks, buddy.

BIRTHDAY BOOZE BANNED
U. of Nebraska, Lincoln

Students can no longer expect free birthday drinks at Lincoln bars. Thirty-seven establishments are trying to clean up their pavement (commonly referred to as "the most puked-upon stretch of concrete in the United States"). Bar owners say they're concerned about birthday bar crawlers who stop in for a free drink at every pub on the strip, consuming as many as 20 shots of liquor, sometimes to the point of alcohol poisoning. "We're not trying to poop on everybody's fun," says one owner. "This way, hopefully, people will run out of money before anyone gets in trouble." Looks like that crisp $10 bill in the birthday card from Grandma will be put to good use after all.

PIGSKIN VOODOO
California State U., San Jose

Blessing your lucky jock is one thing, but hiring a professional to put a curse on your competition? Well, that's exactly what the San Jose State football team is looking to do. The team is searching for the whereabouts of Josephine Canicatti, a Sicilian malocchio, or "evil eye," who is said to be capable of putting spells on sports teams. In 1955, before the World Series, Canicatti was hired by Brooklyn to curse Yankee manager Casey Stengel. Not only did the Yanks lose, but Stengel lost $200,000 in a real-estate deal later that year.

THE PEPSI CHALLENGE?
Shoreline Community College, Wash.

A 21-year-old business student at Shoreline is suing PepsiCo Inc. for alleged breach of contract, fraud, deceptive and unfair trade practices and misleading advertising. You see, he saw an ad saying he could win a Harrier fighter jet for 7 million Pepsi Points. (That's 16,800,000 cans of Pepsi.) Believe it or not, he managed to collect the points. Now he wants his jet, but Pepsi says it was all a joke. Looks like the joke may be on them.

PENNY FOR YOUR THOUGHTS
U. of New Mexico

A man filed a civil complaint against two university psychology professors who refused to acknowledge his "gift" for mental telepathy. After asking one professor to design an experiment to scientifically prove his telepathic abilities, the man was miffed by the outcome, which (surprise, surprise) showed no evidence of mystical powers. The chair of the psychology department wrote the man a letter describing his delusions as "unrealistic and irrational." The man is now asking $5,000 in damages for grievous violations of his civil rights. Hmmm. We had a feeling he'd ask for that much money. Don't know how we knew. It just kind of came to us....

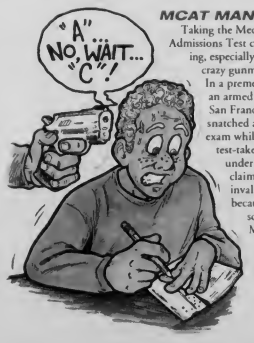
DOUBLE WHAMMY
U. of Minnesota

A student riding his bicycle in the bike lane near campus was struck by a Nissan Pathfinder. Ouch. It was the second time the biker had been hit by a motorist. As if that weren't enough trauma, the motorist got out of the car and proceeded to assault the bicyclist for no apparent reason, hitting him on the back of the head with his fist. The assailant then fled the scene of the crime, giving a whole new meaning to the term "hit and run."

STRIKE UP THE BAND
Alabama State U.

A fight broke out after Alabama's football team beat Jackson State U., Miss., 40–0 in the Labor Day Classic. No, it wasn't bitter players or frenzied fans embroiled in the brouhaha. The skirmish involved the two schools' marching band members, who took their fight songs to heart. The brawl began as the two bands, with about 200 members each, were boarding their buses for home. As the fighting spread, musical instruments were used as weapons. Talk about hitting a sour note.

HIPPO HAVEN
George Washington, U.



To honor the incoming Class of 2000, the university's president used his personal funds to buy a large hippopotamus statue, which is now prominently displayed on the corner of the D.C. campus. As legend has it, the mighty hippo was said to be George Washington's favorite animal. The university president is encouraging students to rub the animal's nose for good luck before exams, ballgames or any other chancy endeavors.

HEADS UP
Colorado State U.

Those Frisbees from hell must be stopped. Complaints about flying discs hitting windows, cars and pedestrians prompted administrators at Colorado State to move the disc-golf course off-campus. Students really need to work on their wrist action and follow through. At least 70 windows were broken in one year thanks to the deadly discs careening off-course.

MCAT MANIAC

Taking the Medical College Admissions Test can be nerve-racking, especially when there's a crazy gunman at your side. In a premeditated incident, an armed man stormed a San Francisco test site and snatched a copy of the exam while more than 100 test-takers crouched under their desks. He claims he was trying to invalidate the test because his friend scored poorly on it. Maybe he just wanted to check their reflexes.

REQUIEM FOR A STUDY AID
U. of California, Berkeley

A dozen medical students paid their last respects to two unnamed cadavers they dissected for their anatomy class. Floral arrangements, incense, Bible verses and music — Elvis Costello to be exact — added warmth to the cold laboratory setting. The memorial was meant to help fledgling doctors learn to deal with death and dying. Maybe the final exam should be canceled to give mourning students a chance to grieve and heal.

Goin' Mobile

Lawn chairs? Check. Pink flamingos? Check. Coolers of beer? Check. Faux wood siding? Double check.

It doesn't sound like the makings of your average dorm dwelling, but students at schools like Utah State U. and the U. of California, Santa Cruz, are finding that mobile home and trailer park living is the life for them.

Utah State offers married students the opportunity to live on one of its 178 mobile home "pads." The university maintains the pads and rents them to students, but the students are responsible for buying the mobile home on the plot.

"The trailer park has been around since 1958," says John Ringle, associate director of housing at USU. "We even have a trailer from '58 that's still there. It's not very mobile, but it's still there."

Students buy their mobile homes — which can range from $10,000 to $20,000 — and pay the school about $175 a month for rent and utilities.

"It's better than renting an apartment," says resident and Utah State grad Brook Ormsby, whose husband is a senior at the school. "The rent is cheap, you get back what you put into it when you sell it, and you can remodel it or do whatever you want with it."

The trailer park at Santa Cruz isn't only for married students, although the number of spaces is limited to about 45 slots, says resident and senior Josh Muir.

"There's a long waiting list because this is a great place to live," Muir says. "It doesn't feel like you're living on campus, even though you are. I wouldn't be able to live in the dorm — the people and the atmosphere are just different."

Muir says that other than a few lawn chairs around the park, the trailer park stereotype isn't really true at Santa Cruz.

"The park isn't really trashy, like some people would expect," he says. "But for this kind of rent, I can put up with any trailer park stigma."

File Under Scholastics

"My term paper was confiscated by the government." "My absence was due to an alien abduction." "An out-of-body experience made me fall asleep in class."

These excuses might not fly with ordinary instructors, but U. of Washington's Sean MacKenzie doesn't teach an ordinary class.

MacKenzie is the instructor for The Real X-Files, a course that teaches students how to investigate the kinds of paranormal phenomena featured on the TV show. The elective is offered through UW's Experimental College, a nonprofit continuing education program.

In the class, MacKenzie provides documentation on mysterious phenomena. Like the surgeon who removes implants from patients who claim they were abducted by aliens. Then there's the reptilian goat vampire, called "El Chupacabras," that reportedly sucks blood out of farm animals in Florida and Puerto Rico. And don't discount missing-time experiences — e.g., it's noon, you see an alien in the backyard, you check your watch and suddenly it's 9 p.m.

Basically, anything that's been investigated by Scully and Mulder is fair game for MacKenzie's syllabus.

"Strange clouds fly over, and it rains frogs. Stuff like this really happens," MacKenzie says.

Alice Lancaster, an environmental engineering grad student, says she took the class because of a scientific interest in unexplained phenomena. But some classmates told her they had seen UFOs and wanted to make sense of their experiences.

"I've always had a childlike wonder about the fantastic," Lancaster says. "I think everyone has some sort of experience with the unexplained."

A Page in History

Jeannie Rhoads almost screwed up her chance to be the Republican National Convention's chief page — twice.

"I almost had my name pulled from the pile," says Rhoads, a senior at Point Loma Nazarene College, Calif. She had already accepted a paid internship with CBS to cover the convention but later decided to turn it down.

Then Rhoads went to the final interview and thought she really blew it when the interviewers asked her if she was a Republican. "I told them that, honestly, I don't agree with everything on the party platform."

Although Rhoads goes along with the basic premise of the party, she feels Republicans need to pay more attention to the environment and consider more gun control.

"I'm not Alex P. Keaton, but I do believe in smaller government and individual responsibility," she says.

As chief page, Rhoads coordinated the movement of 250 pages at the convention. She also served as a youth ambassador at the convention's Young Voters' Program, which was designed to educate 16- to 24-year-olds about political issues.

"That's where my heart was," she says.

A youth convention sponsored by the program was held the last day of the national convention. Complete with bands, celebrities and political figures, it commemorated the 25th anniversary of the 26th Amendment — passed during the Vietnam War — which gave 18-year-olds the right to vote.

"You had teens going off to fight, but they couldn't vote," Rhoads says. "It's so important to start young and be concerned."

Serving as chief page kept Rhoads busy. Between interviews with CNN, MTV and The New York Times, canceling an appearance on Good Morning America and carrying out her duties, Rhoads never had a moment to herself.

"I wouldn't think about eating. Sometimes I worked from 7 a.m. to 4 a.m. Basically, it was the best and worst time of my life."

I just got paged.

The Buzz

- American College Testing (ACT) reports that the percentage of students who drop out after their first year has reached a new high. With a 26.9 percent freshman dropout rate, one in every four freshmen will not return sophomore year. Additionally, the number of students who graduate within five years has reached an all-time low of 53.3 percent.
- The typical student borrower accumulates more than $10,000 in education debt, according to an analysis by USA Group Loan Services, one of the nation's largest student-loan administrators.
- A recent survey of college women shows that big bucks aren't a top priority when choosing the men they want to date or marry. Wealth ranked behind qualities like honesty, good looks and having time for family life. The survey was conducted by researcher Michael Cunningham from the U. of Louisville, Ky.

Screwing Up

If you think welfare or health care are ill-conceived government programs, you can probably imagine how elected officials legislate sex. Well, imagine no more!

Willowdale, Ore. — It's against the law for a husband to talk dirty during sex.

Alabama — A man cannot seduce a chaste woman by means of "temptation, deception, arts, flattery or a promise of marriage."

14 states — Heterosexual oral sex is illegal. In 21 states, gay oral sex is illegal.

Term Papers Suck

OH, WHAT A TANGLED WEB WE WEAVE WHEN FIRST WE PRACTICE to deceive. Kenneth Sahr, a sophomore at Florida International U., can relate. His "schoolsucks" site (http://www.schoolsucks.com) has stirred up enough controversy to keep the hits coming for months. And although his intention isn't to deceive professors, the site — which includes a massive file of research papers waiting to be downloaded — walks a fine line.

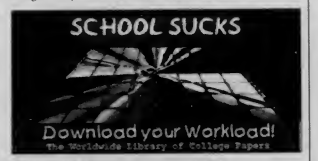
The site received national attention over the summer — all because Sahr forgot that students are away from campus during the summer. That proved to be his most fortunate error.

In soliciting papers to start the site, Sahr contacted his natural allies — frarernities, which are known for having exam and research paper files. But because it was summer, fraternity advisers received the messages, and plagiarism alarm bells went off. Since then, Sahr has been bombarded by the media — better advertisement than a full-page ad in The New York Times, he says.

"[Professors'] fear of what could happen and their lack of trust in their students gave me free publicity. I absolutely thank them for that."

Sahr gets hundreds of messages daily from professors criticizing the site and claiming it encourages plagiarism. Another site (hrtp://missouri.edu/~rhetnet/schoolsucks/) was set up to provide a forum for debate about "schoolsucks." But Sahr argues that plagiarism shouldn't be a concern. He calls the site just another academic library.

"I'm against plagiarism. It's immoral, period," he says.



Sahr reasons that there are already organizations advertised in magazines like Rolling Stone that allow you to buy term papers. He says "schoolsucks" — which both professors and students can access — will actually put those organizations out of business, thereby curtailing plagiarism.

If students turn in papers from "schoolsucks," they should be kicked out of school for stupidity as well as for plagiarism, Sahr says.

As for the site's name and motto — Download Your Workload — Sahr says it's just hype.

"If [school] sucked, none of us would be there in the first place."

Olympic Ordeal

What was supposed to be an Olympic dream turned out to be a busload of bad memories for more than 3,000 students who traveled to the Games in Atlanta.

Atlanta-based Creative Travel Services hired high school and college students to work concession stands in exchange for a bus ticket, housing and $5 per hour. When workers arrived from as far as California and Hawaii, they discovered no housing, no jobs and no explanation. Organizers bused the stranded students to a local warehouse.

Brittany Marshall, a junior at Florida State U., passed on a summer job as a lifeguard to go to Atlanta. She spent two nights there — the first with 200 people, the second with 3,000.

"When we first arrived, we went over 20 hours without eating. When we finally ate, we had a sandwich that wasn't good. And nobody could have seconds. If it hadn't been for a local reverend, it would have been a total disaster. He wound up paying for 20 rooms — four people to a room."

The minister paid for one night at s hotel. The students came up with cash for a second. Marshall says some groups had 15 to 20 people in each room. Attitude, she says, was all that got her through the ordeal.

"We were the only group who made the best of it. We had a good time because we made it fun ourselves."

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation (GBI) and the Georgia Attorney General's Office are investigating whether the problems were criminal violations or just bad business. Officials say a resolution is a long way off.

"There's no timetine for this investigation. Everywhere we look, there's something that needs to be looked at," says John Bankhead, spokesperson for GBi.

Investigators say Creativa Travel Services moved its business out of town. The business phone is listed in Atlanta, but a recording says the number has been temporarily disconnected.

Maybe John Tesh should help by stepping in with a little commentary on yet another Olympic tragedy.

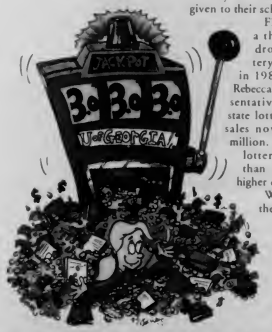
Easy Money

IT MAY SEEM LIKE LOTtery players are just throwing their money away, but if you're in college, they might actually be throwing money at you.

Thirty-seven states operate lotteries, and several earmark a percentage of lottery money for higher education.



For some Georgia high school students, the lottery is their only HOPE of going to college. Since 1993, about 200,000 students have cashed in on Georgia's HOPE (Helping Outstanding Students Educationally) scholars program, which allows any Georgia high schooler with a 3.0 to go to any college in Georgia — public or private — for free. The program, funded by the Georgia Lottery for Education, gives students a renewable scholarship, including full tuition, fees and a book stipend.

One-third of the Georgia lottery, which earns around $550 million annually, is reserved to fund HOPE scholarships. This fall, 97 percent of the entering in-state students at the U. of Georgia are HOPE scholars, as are 98 percent of in-state freshmen at Georgia Tech.

Governor Zell Miller, a former college professor, created the HOPE program to help students in the same predicament he faced as a student. After two years of community college, Miller ran out of funds to continue his education and joined the Marines. The G.I. Bill allowed him to get his degree later.

"I recently met a nurse in DeKalb. She makes $28,000 and has three kids in college. All of them are HOPE scholars," Miller says. Without help, she couldn't have sent one, he says.

Other states with lotteries reserve between 30 and 38 percent of lottery profits for education. California's lottery, designed solely to benefit education, gives 34 percent of sales to schools. Of the $8 billion generated since 1985, the state's community college system received 12.57 percent; the California State U. system, 4.22 percent; and the U. of California system, 2.42 percent. The lottery's official Web site (http://www.calottery.com) lets students pinpoint exactly how much money was given to their school.

Florida had been in a three-year revenue drop when the lottery was established in 1988. According to Rebecca Negron, a representative in the Florida state lottery office, ticket sales now average $800 million. In 1995–96, the lottery raked in more than $124 million for higher education.

When it comes to the lottery, looks like you don't have to play to win.

'50s: Wanna go steady? '90s: Wanna move in?

Live-in Learn

BIRDS DO IT, BEES do it, even educated fleas — um, college students, actually — do it. But unlike the song, these young couples aren't just falling in love. They're taking the next step: cohabitation.

The "C" word for young couples in the '90s is that twilight zone between single and married life — a fifth dimension, where dating and sex mingle with housecleaning and phone bills.

"It's a test drive to marriage," says two-time cohabiter Michael Hallstone, a sociology grad student at the U. of Hawaii. "Do I really want to buy this model?"

For years, sociologists have argued whether cohabiting will prepare a couple for a blissful marriage or lead them down the highway to relationship hell. But one thing is certain: Move in with people, and you'll get to know the real, uncensored, unrestrained them.

"He's much messier than I thought," says Erin Weston, a U. of Houston grad student, of her live-in mate.

When the happy couple moved in together, both cited financial convenience as one of the biggest reasons. But Roland H. Johnson III, a Blinn College, Texas, sociology instructor, says the sexes usually cohabit for different reasons.

"Most females really believe they are going to marry the guy," he says. "But young men say their No. 1 reason for cohabitation is readily available sex."

Johnson says couples can also face problems with division of labor, finances and parental disapproval — the fear of which can cause the whole relationship to become a lie.

"I don't really want my dad to know," says a California State U., Fresno, junior, who wishes to remain anonymous. "He just thinks my boyfriend comes over a lot."

The psychology major admits that living together without the safety net of a commitment can be difficult, but she hopes cohabitation will lead to something more permanent.

"I don't know if we'll get married," she says. "You can't say you will or you'll jinx it. But I hope so."

Thinking about popping the not-quite-so-big question? Well, here are some facts you should know about shackin' up before you sign on to the lease.

- About 15 percent of people in their early 20s have lived with a partner.
- The average cohabitation lasts less than one year.
- The number of young cohabiting couples has risen from 500,000 in 1970 to 3.6 million today.
- Although studies vary widely, cohabiting before marriage generally doesn't affect marital satisfaction or divorce rates.
- There is a higher level of domestic violence in ongoing cohabiting relationships than in ongoing marriages.
- Most housework is done by the woman in both cohabiting relationships and marriage.

JUSTICE FOR ALL?

The jury's still out on college judicial boards

BY BRETT VERMILYEA

AND AMY HELMES
ASSISTANT EDITOR

MURRAY STATE U., KY.

IMAGINE CLOSED JUDICIAL proceedings, operating in complete secrecy, in which the accused has no right to counsel, witnesses or appeal. Picture a rape victim who has no right to attend her case's hearing or to warn others of her attacker's identity or punishment — no rights except those the court chooses to grant, which in many instances are few.

Such proceedings couldn't operate in the United States, right? Wrong. In fact, closed judicial proceedings with confidential records operate on college campuses across the country.

A private matter

In 1974, Congress passed the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act. One part of this legislation, known as the Buckley Amendment, prohibits schools from releasing a student's records — except to other schools or administrators — without that student's consent. Such records are grades, classes, counseling and disciplinary records.

Most campuses also conduct confidential disciplinary proceedings, saying that Buckley protects campus records and must therefore protect the proceedings that create those records.

The closed disciplinary records — which include any sanctions against a student, from underage drinking to sexual assault — are under attack by students and administrators who question the law's fairness.

The Campus Courts Task Force (CCTF), a national journalism organization, opposes the Buckley Amendment.

"Despite its best intentions, the judicial hearing environment is ripe for abuse when there is nobody from the public to witness it functioning," says Gordon McKerral, president of CCTF.

Carolyn Carlson, founder of the CCTF, has testified before Congress in support of the Open Campus Security Log Act, which would require campuses to maintain daily crime logs and keep them open for public inspection.

"If these courts were public, then students could see for themselves that everybody gets treated fairly — that they're not being treated differently because of what fraternity they happen to be in or what race they are or what sex they are or anything," Carlson says.

Bill Kibler, a past president of the Association for Student Judicial Affairs, disagrees, saying that open hearings may cause judicial boards to cater to public opinion and render unjust decisions.

"I'm not convinced that if you opened the doors and shined the light of the media, things would change dramatically," Kibler says.

The ambiguity of campus judicial boards adds to the confusion. Because they aren't legal entities, judicial boards aren't required to provide students with the rights afforded by due process, and schools can take only minimal action, like suspension or disciplinary probation, against the students.

"One of the reasons the [campus] court doesn't have standards as high as a court does is because it doesn't have the authority that a real court does," Kibler says. "The most authority it has is to kick someone out of school."

Crime and punishment

Max Fraad-Wolff knows the campus court process firsthand. As a junior at Vassar College in 1994, he was accused of leaving a harassing message on another student's answering machine.

"Any judicial system that works this way is a disaster."
MAX FRAAD-WOLFF, GRAD STUDENT, U. OF MASSACHUSETTS, AMHERST

"Once I was accused, it was over," says Fraad-Wolff, who compared his experience to the Salem witch trials or the McCarthy Red Scare. "[Administrators] were able to turn me into something that made the Antichrist look like a choir boy."

He says the college judicial board denied him the presence of his lawyer or parents. He wasn't allowed to show evidence that his accuser first blamed someone else but then withdrew the complaint. The board also refused to allow a voice analysis of the tape, and the school confiscated his personal notes from the six-hour hearing.

Fraad-Wolff was eventually found neither innocent nor guilty.

"I was basically sentenced to a limbo," says Wolff, now a grad student at the U. of Massachusetts, Amherst. "Any judicial system that works this way is a disaster."

Conflict of interest

In 1995, Christy Brzonkala accused two Virginia Tech football players of raping her. She did not press criminal charges but, at the advice of her parents and friends, decided to let the campus judicial system handle the case.

Virginia Tech's judicial board suspended one of the two defendants, finding him guilty of sexual misconduct. Four months later, after an appeal and another seven-hour hearing, his violation was downgraded to probation and a one-hour educational session before he was allowed back on the football team.

"It was the most agonizing seven hours of my life," Brzonkala says. "I was shafted. I didn't have any clue what was going on."

Brzonkala, now a student at George Mason U. in Virginia, filed a civil suit against Virginia Tech as well as the two football players. The suit was dismissed and is now in the process of being appealed.

Eileen Wagner, Brzonkala's lawyer, says Virginia Tech was simply trying to cover itself and the millions of dollars in revenue that the school gets from the football team.

"When you put the university into the role of advocate for the victim, advocate for the accused, investigator, judge and jury, you're just opening yourself up for a conflict of interests," Wagner says. "They turned the rules into a pretzel in order to restore eligibility of a star football player."

Wagner says when schools take the law into their own hands, they are only concerned with serving themselves and that they use the secrecy of the Buckley Amendment to protect their own reputations rather than to protect students' privacy.

"It was really a kangaroo court," Wagner says of the school judicial board. "They absolutely mauled Christy in the process. It's absolutely horrifying what went on."

The verdict

As a result of a 1993 Georgia Supreme Court decision, the U. of Georgia is one of the few schools whose student judicial hearings are open to public scrutiny. The school's student newspaper, The Red and Black, sued the school, arguing that Buckley only covers records, not proceedings. The courts ruled in favor of the school newspaper.

The U. of Georgia decision has paved the way for others in the fight to bring judicial boards and campus crime under public scrutiny. The student newspapers at the U. of Miami, Ohio, and at the U. of North Carolina are both involved in litigation against their schools for more access to campus judicial records and campus court hearings.

The federal government is getting in on the act, too. In September, the House of Representatives passed a resolution urging the Department of Education to enforce the timely reporting of campus crime.

Since the Georgia Supreme Court decision, the Department of Education has maintained that Buckley does not cover judicial proceedings. As a result, campus court proceedings cannot be closed in the name of Buckley, as most colleges claim.

"If you're a student at a campus, and you march up to a hearing and you say, 'I want to be allowed to sit in on this hearing,' and that judicial officer says, 'No, we can't let you be in here because the Buckley Amendment prevents it,' they're not telling you the truth," McKerral says. "It's wrong."

Students relive their dates from hell

HERE AT U. MAGAZINE, WE FEEL YOUR DATING PAIN. † As connoisseurs of broken relationships, nightmare stalkers and, of course, dates from hell, we have deep empathy for those who bravely undertake the masochistic societal ritual commonly known as "dating." † In an effort to ease your agonizing memories (and to prepare you for Friday nights to come), we scoured the country — from Portland, Maine, to Portland, Oregon — for bad date stories. After several weeks of intense research broken only by the occasional beer run, we have compiled the ultimate collection of dates from hell: We've got blind dates, sleazy dates, cheap dates, nerd dates, lecherous dates and, yes, even dates with facial tics. † We just want you to know: It's not your fault. You're not alone.

Mind Games

A date's bedroom — potentially the site of a passionate encounter or a best-avoided sand trap. For Michelle Hader, a senior at Northern Kentucky U., it was the latter, only golf wasn't the game she needed to play to escape.

Hader's date had a bedroom about the size of a Toyota, and once she entered, he locked the door behind them. He kept the key on a chain around his neck.

"I began looking for escape routes, since I was locked in," Hader says. "There was only one small circular window at the top of his room. I was stuck."

Her date turned on the TV, but not the lights. They were watching The X-Files when the TV suddenly snapped off. Hader's date said the TV sometimes went off on its own and there was nothing he could do about it. Hmm, wonder what they could do now?

"We could listen to the radio," he suggested. "Or we could play a game. Or we could KISS?"

Hader realized she had no choice. Sometimes you have to make the tough choices to survive. For the next two hours, Hader allowed her date to use her for a passionate game of backgammon.

After the last roll of the dice, Hader blasted out of her date's driveway so fast, she rammed into a passing car. An accident? Who cares? Hader kept on driving.

Visually Challenged Date

One student discovered that the only thing worse than a blind date is a blind date with twitchy eyes.

Kristie, a grad student at West Chester U., Pa., found herself dining with her blind date at Chez Taco Bell. Needless to say, Kristie felt a little overdressed while sampling the burrito du jour. Even worse, her unsuitable suitor was a nervous wreck whose eyes were twitching constantly.

"So we sat there mostly silent," Kristie says.

Until Kristie got an uncontrollable case of the giggles.

"Every time his eye twitched, I couldn't help myself," she says. "I had this idea that he was trying to make a move on me by blinking."

In true giggle attack form, the more Kristie tried to stop herself, the harder she laughed.

"Once I finally managed to stop laughing for a moment, I took a big drink of soda," Kristie says. "And before I could swallow, he winked again."

Kristie spewed the soda all over herself, the table and Rico Suave.

"We were both covered in Diet Coke, but I was the only one laughing."

Amazingly enough, Blinky didn't ask her out again.

Hot Date

Nick Anderson, a junior at U. of Nevada, Las Vegas, insists he was the victim on a bad double date experience to the county fair.

"To start things off, it took about 30 minutes to find a parking place, and I had two women in the back seat bitching at me to hurry up because their favorite singer was performing," he says, not at all bitter. "My blood started to boil, and I calmly said, 'Well, you could help me look.'"

The happy foursome went on to roam the fairgrounds, and Anderson was disappointed to find his girlfriend giving him the cold shoulder. After, they stopped at a Denny's-type restaurant.

"To lighten things up, I played a joke on her by pouring Tabasco sauce in the catsup for her fries," he says.

But his girlfriend suspected something was amiss.

"So I said, 'What, you don't trust me?'"

Taking a leap of faith, his girlfriend dipped a fry and ate it.

"Her face got so red, but only me and my friend were laughing," Anderson says. "Then I got to hear 20 minutes of bitching on trust."

Amazingly, the couple broke up shortly afterward.

"Romance is dead!" he says.

By the way, Anderson's name on his e-mail address is "Don Juan."

Legends of the Fall

Sherri Eisenberg, James Madison U., Va., fell for her date from hell — about three stories.

It was Eisenberg's first time out with her new love interest, and they decided to go to a movie. Next to the theater was a construction site. John Ritter couldn't have set the stage better.

"After the movie, we walked out, and I fell down this three-story hole they had cut into the ground," says Eisenberg. "I wasn't hurt — just a few cuts and scrapes — but I had a huge split in the front of my pants."

Well, talk about a rip-roaring good ti— sorry.

Stop! Or My Dad Will Freak!

"My worst date wasn't really the girl's fault," says Mike Garcia, a freshman at California Polytechnic State U., San Luis Obispo. "But at the time, it was really scary."

Garcia says he had a great time on his date, but when he dropped her off at home, the horror began.

"Her dad met us at the door and in a stern voice told me to meet him in the car and told her to get in bed," Garcia says.

Dad marched Garcia out to the family wagon. For the next two hours, Dad drove him around town — past the swamp, past the graveyard, over the river bridge.

"He kept asking what I planned to do with his daughter," Garcia says. "I was scared shitless. I had no idea whether he was going to beat me up or yell at me or what."

Sharp-Dressed Man

"There was this very dorky guy who had been wanting to take me out," says Tara Tuckwiller, a senior at Virginia Tech. "I eventually agreed to go bowling at the student union — very casual."

But her budding bowling beau had other ideas. When Tuckwiller opened her front door, she found her socially challenged date dressed in a full suit with a bouquet of roses in hand. Tuckwiller was wearing a T-shirt and shorts.

"Needless to say, when he dropped me off afterward, I kinda bolted," she says.

True to geek form, Tuckwiller's date from hell sent her a thank-you card.

Obligatory Dumb Sorority Girl Story

"I've always thought blind dates are best left to blind people," says Steve Willey, senior, U. of Nebraska, Lincoln. "Because I'm an idiot, I accepted."

But Willey was pleasantly surprised to find his date, a sorority girl named Lori, was quite attractive.

"Unfortunately, her wonderful looks sucked every available chromosome from her gene pool, because there were none left for such things as intelligence or the ability to hold in a burp," he says.

In the car, Lori showed off her "got your nose" trick. Once at the movie, Lori bombarded Willey with questions about the complex metaphorical motifs in Babe. After, they went to a Greek hangout, where Willey quickly discovered the patron's conversation was, well, Greek to him.

"Having only my beers to talk to, the night ended with me getting so drunk I fell off the barstool."

A week later, Willey's friend asked Lori what she thought of their night together.

"She said I was a poor excuse for a human being."

Obligatory Dumb Frat Guy Story

Not wanting to perpetuate baseless myths and stereotypes (that sorority girls are dumb, for instance) here's evidence that Greek guys can be just as stupid.

"My best friend set me up with her boyfriend's fraternity brother," says Michele Kratochvil, a senior at the U. of Nebraska, Lincoln. "What a mistake."

First, Kratochvil's date arrived bearing, not roses, but a corsage … to go on a hay ride. But frat boy's sense of appropriateness didn't stop at the florist.

Says Kratochvil: "The fashion police obviously missed him. He was wearing his yellow Big Bird T-shirt and a pair of plaid boxers."

After a strictly literal roll in the hay, Kratochvil was stuck with Don Juan in the middle of a field.

"We had absolutely nothing in common, except that our mutual friends were making out next to us," she says.

Still, Kratochvil's fraternity date tried his best to make conversation.

"The guy insisted on telling me about his gerbils."

Dancing With Myself

Alex Outhred, a senior at the U. of Michigan, not only had a date from hell early in life, but his experience was set to '80s music.

"I was in sixth grade, and I was at my first big dance," he says.

Alex was fortunate enough to have a job as a Ford Model kid, and there were lots of pre-teen knockouts at the Ford kids Christmas party.

"I was dancing by myself. Lots of parents were there, including mine. This girl was in the eighth grade. She was pretty hot and actually asked me to dance. I hadn't danced with a girl before — and she asked me!"

Her name wasn't Rio — it was Heather — but that didn't matter to Outhred. He was just stoked to be doing his bitchin' Springsteen "Dancing in the Dark" moves with an older babe.

HE SAID:

"She was like a walking goddess to me. But I had never envisioned a drunk, obscene goddess."

JAMES WATSON, SENIOR,
U. OF WEST FLORIDA

SHE SAID:

"The guy insisted on telling me about his gerbils."

MICHELE KRATOCHVIL, SENIOR,
U. OF NEBRASKA, LINCOLN

Then he heard it: the sound of his parents talking. Before he could throw up any defenses — like, maybe a sound-proof wall — mom belted out, "Oh, my little baby's having his first dance!"

"Heather heard it, I heard it, everybody heard it," Outhred says. "So I looked at this girl with the 'it doesn't matter that she just completely embarrassed me, does it?' look with wide-open eyes."

But his Madonna wannabe stopped dancing, let out a loud huff of air, shook her head and walked away.

Outhred ended up dancing with his mom.

A Sort of Homecoming

High school senior year Homecoming — fertile breeding ground for a date from hell. And James Watson, a U. of West Florida senior, found he not only couldn't go home again, he wouldn't want to.

"Her name was Danielle. She had a great tan, long, dark blond hair, blue eyes, a body by Fisher and was very popular," Watson says.

But looks — even built by Fisher — can be deceiving.

"She was like a walking goddess to me. But I had never envisioned a drunk, obscene goddess."

Watson brought roses, rented a convertible Mercedes and had reservations at a posh hillside resort. But after dinner, Danielle got very intoxicated.

"She started nasty dancing with everybody," Watson says. "Watching her falling all over well-dressed couples, I tried to go to her aid. But she started screaming, calling me all kinds of obscenities. A perfect spectacle."

Danielle ditched Watson, and after spending several hours alone in the expensive hotel room, he went searching for her. Other classmates who were also staying at the resort told Watson she had gone to a party in another room. The party was thrown by two classmates Watson considered mortal enemies.

"I went in the room, and I found her laying in between the two guys, butt-naked, smoking and totally unashamed," he says.

But this date from hell has an epilogue. Watson saw his drunken beauty queen last summer for the first time in 10 years.

"She is 100 pounds overweight and waiting tables at Denny's," he says. "I thought, 'Wow, she did me a favor that night.'"

On dates from hell: "Guys ask me out and when I kinda get into it, they get freaked out and bail. I guess it freaks them out because I'm a little too powerful."

U. Crew Blues

Yes, even U. Magazine editors have dates from hell.

Men Are From Mars

On a date with an actor/screenwriter/whatever, the guy launched into a godawful monologue — something bizarre about the cosmos and paranormal crap. When I asked him why he was so interested in all that X-Files stuff, he said, "When I was 12, I was abducted by space aliens." Check please! — Frances Huffman

Mouth of the Living Dead

My date and I had been drinking red wine for a few hours. Even though I was nervous, we did the whole first kiss thing, and I went home feeling love was in the air. Then, I looked in the mirror and — GASP! — purple everywhere. My lips, tongue and teeth were stained from the wine. Meanwhile, my date's teeth were Pearl Drop white. — Amy Helmes

Basic Instincts

My date was bisexual, but I figured that wouldn't be a problem. We were at a club with my straitlaced female boss from a previous job. My former boss blurted out that they were bisexual. "My date's bi too," I said. The two of them then launched a bilateral attack on my date. I was irked, but what's a guy to do? Soon my so-called date was mugging with my old boss right there in the club. — James Hibberd

Double Your Pleasure

My date picked me up in a Corvette with his best friend, and I had to ride on the lap of a stranger. The best friend rubbed my side and whispered in my ear while my date told me how much he enjoyed my company. At the pool hall, I was shown how to hold the cue stick more than once. I finished off my Coors Cutter and made a run for the door. — Carrie Bell

Stop Pinching My Penny!

At 11:30 p.m. my boyfriend called, insisting that we go out even though I had to get up early the next morning. Then he suggested I come pick him up. So we spent an hour at a diner. Our bill came to $1.80, and I suggested we give the waitress an extra tip. He just looked at me blankly and dug into his pocket. He had 30 cents. Needless to say, I dumped his ass that weekend. — Melissa Grego

STRAIGHT, BUT NOT NARROW

Some colleges come out in support of gay students

BY MAROLYN KRASNER

ADDITIONAL REPORTING BY CARRIE BELL, ASSISTANT EDITOR

WOULD AN NFL HOPEFUL GO TO A COLLEGE WITH no football team? Would someone who wanted Greek letters on his résumé go to a school without a fraternity row? Would a prospective biologist apply to universities without long lab hours or good research opportunities?

So why would a gay, lesbian or bisexual coed not look for gay-friendly academia when cruising for a campus? Perhaps a tougher question is: What makes a college a positive environment for someone who is a member of one of the most under-represented minorities?

David Buckel, a Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund attorney, wishes he had an easy answer.

"Students really benefit from a gay-friendly setting in which they don't worry about their physical safety and emotional well-being," says Buckel, whose organization protects gays' legal and civil rights. "It allows them to focus on getting the education they went for in the first place."

Starting point

Resources are slim for finding schools that are straight, but not narrow. The best strategy is to go directly to the source — students, alumni, faculty and activist groups. Expert guides tend to ignore the subject, but Jan-Mitchell Sherrill, assistant dean of students at George Washington U., Washington, D.C., took the subject head-on. The Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Students' Guide to Colleges, Universities and Graduate Schools (NYU Press) rates schools on a scale from gay friendly to absolutely intolerable using the real experts — students.

Sherrill and co-author Craig Hardesty distributed surveys to gay, lesbian and bisexual student organizations at 1,100 U.S. colleges. Schools earned points for gay student organizations, supportive policies, gay-friendly curricula and resources such as medical services and counseling. Oberlin College, Ohio, Reed College, Ore., and Johns Hopkins U. are some of the schools that earned high marks from those surveyed. They said pass on Dartmouth College, N.H., U. of Colorado and Boston U.

Under the rainbow flag

Unfortunately, ranking universities isn't all that simple. And even universities that want to go the extra mile for gays have trouble measuring up. Criteria seem to vary from student to student.

Sean M. Burke, a grad student at Northwestern U. in Illinois, says a university's general attitude toward gay students often mirrors the attitude of its surrounding community.

"If a school is upbeat and progressive, expect it to be accommodating of gay folks. If a school has a strong activist streak, you can expect the gay community there to be very active."

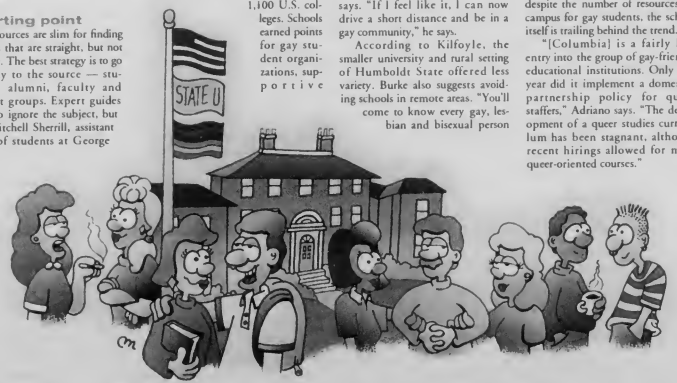
For senior Will Kilfoyle, a gay community — or lack thereof — at rural Humboldt State U., Calif., was a major factor in his decision to transfer to California State U., Sacramento. "There [Humboldt], I was made more aware of it. You feel that strangeness a little more sharply."

The presence of large gay communities in nearby San Francisco and Sacramento helps gay students know they aren't alone, Kilfoyle says. "If I feel like it, I can now drive a short distance and be in a gay community," he says.

According to Kilfoyle, the smaller university and rural setting of Humboldt State offered less variety. Burke also suggests avoiding schools in remote areas. "You'll come to know every gay, lesbian and bisexual person there in no time at all, simply because there won't be very many."

Schools with a religious administration may be a problem also, Burke says. "Brigham Young U. is a Mormon school. You are certifiably insane if you are gay and want to go there."

Burke also suggests checking what the school's administrative policies toward gays are like. "Ask faculty, recruiters, alumni and students. If they're uncomfortable answering questions like, 'Does this school have a domestic partnership policy for gay, lesbian and bisexual students?' that's a bad sign."



The choice is yours

Joneil Adriano, a graduate of Columbia U., warns that other elements may be more important to consider when deciding on a college.

"As far as I was concerned, it didn't matter [if Columbia was gay friendly] because I was so close to Greenwich Village. First and foremost, I was concerned that I was going to the best school possible, followed closely by how big and accessible the nearest gay, lesbian and bisexual community was."

But the issue of gay-friendliness did cross her mind. She says that despite the number of resources on campus for gay students, the school itself is trailing behind the trend.

"[Columbia] is a fairly late entry into the group of gay-friendly educational institutions. Only this year did it implement a domestic-partnership policy for queer staffers," Adriano says. "The development of a queer studies curriculum has been stagnant, although recent hirings allowed for more queer-oriented courses."

STATE U

For most, being gay isn't the most important factor to consider when choosing colleges, but students say it can make for a smoother ride on the road to the real world.

Kilfoyle says an accepting school atmosphere allows you to be yourself. "I want to feel a sense of ease when I hold hands with somebody. It should be no different than heterosexuals showing affection."

In many cases, colleges are paving the way to a future where rainbow flags whip in the wind along with the stars and stripes and the admission policy reads, "Come as you are."

Marolyn Love Krasner accepts others for who they are because her hidden past includes a commune and the Guru Prem.

Now for the bad news...

Although the future seems bright for an end to homophobia in higher education, there are still incidents that make it seem like we're stuck in the Dark Ages. Here's a small sample:

- Aug. '96: Students and alumni at Washington State U. protested when the school's mascot appeared in a gay-pride parade.
- July '96: A gay student at Penn State U. was verbally harassed and punched into unconsciousness.
- July '96: A U. of Miami football player was arrested for assault of the captain of the track team, who was allegedly spreading rumors that the football player was gay.
- Summer '96: The U. of Maryland Board of Regents voted against faculty domestic-partner benefits for gay and unmarried couples.
- Feb. '96: Boston College administrators called a gay-student group's drag show "offensive to the tradition of Boston College."
- Republicans at Pennsylvania's Bucknell U. wore khakis to demonstrate "true family values" on the same day students who support gay rights are asked to wear denim.
- '95: Central Michigan U. library books on gay issues were thrown into a toilet. It was the second incident within several weeks.

Doodles for Dollars

ATTENTION DOODLERS, graffiti artists and Gary Larson wannabes: Dig up your caricature of Mrs. Wigglethorpe from third grade — it could be your first step on the road to becoming a rich and famous cartoonist.

Just ask Penn State U. senior Gerard Arantowicz. He's one of many cartoonists whose work went from student rags to international mags. His cartoon, "The Truth Hurts," appears in Penn State's Daily Collegian. He's also published a coloring book and educational books in Korea.

"I started out as a little kid with a crayon," Arantowicz says.

But it takes more than crayons to make it in this business, he adds. Successful cartoonists are part Garry Trudeau and part Merrill Lynch.

"It's very tough," admits Nick Gorish, a student at Moraine Valley Community College, Ill.

Gorish and his cousin Steve Tenebrini, a student at the U. of Minnesota, self-publish Oblivion, a book of black-and-white comics that's distributed in Chicago and Minnesota.

Self-publishing and student publications can be great launching pads, but the serious cash comes from syndication — that's when a lucky artist gets published in multiple papers and gets multiple bucks from each paper the comic strip runs in. Cha-ching!

Ed Taylor, a former U. of Iowa student, stayed on as cartoonist for the Daily Iowan after he stopped taking classes to raise a family. In July, King Features Syndicate, the big kahuna of cartoon and comic strip syndication, paid $50 apiece for two of his cartoons.

But syndicate corporations have an advantage over aspiring cartoonists. "They're the only game in town," Taylor says.

A dwindling 250 full-time editorial cartoonists get work in the United States, and only about two good staff jobs open up annually. Winning big in the drawing game seems so difficult that many wonder why artists even try — especially in college.

"I started to self-syndicate for the simple reason that I was tired of being a starving artist," says Alan Gardner, a junior at Utah State U.

Gardner sells his strip, "Butros," a regular feature of the Utah Statesman, to three other college newspapers across the nation. He also does editorial cartoons for the city newspaper.

"The campus newspaper is the major source of income. It's not a lot, but it pays the rent. The free-lance for the city paper — that keeps my refrigerator full," says Gardner.

So how's life as a sketching star?

"People think we just sit around and doodle all day, which isn't true," Gardner says. "We doodle all day with deadlines."

Superman Curl

It's a bird. It's a plane. It's Superman Curl. By day they hold regular jobs and attend medical school. By night the quartet instills its own brand of justice by rocking Minneapolis.

Bruce Hanson, Chris Banick, Joel Reiss and Chris "Doogie" Schoonover formed the band three years ago to use their "cool band gimmicks." Current ploys include a guitar-shaped fly swatter and a travel toothbrush. They've also been known to send vandalized Elton John records.

All joking aside, Superman's self-titled debut has earned comparisons to the Replacements, Violent Femmes and Jonathan Richman. Superman have that loud, guitar-heavy, lyric-simple, garage sound we've come to love.

"I get warm all over when they say we play passionate, spirited music," Reiss says.

The others set sights on bigger comparisons. "The best compliment is to be compared to Joel [Reiss]. He gets all the chicks," bassist Banick says.

Superman Curl hope this inspiration will lead to an out-of-town gig. Meanwhile, they'll keep using 3M products, peppering conversation with "you betchas," playing rants and avoiding kryptonite.

Chainsaw Kittens
Chainsaw Kittens
Mercury

"And sometimes it just gets too dramatic," sings vocalist Tyson Mead on Chainsaw Kittens' fourth full-length release.

You can whine that again.

From the not-as-twisted-as-you'd-think Wizard of Oz homage, "Dorothy's Last Fling," to the six-string scratching on "Speedway Oklahoma," this self-titled disc provides some listenable alterna-punk for those who can't wait for that new Violent Femmes album.

Although most of the tracks are short (three and a half minutes, max), the 14 songs begin to blend together, and Mead's Morrissey-on-helium voice begins to grate. Chainsaw Kittens is one of those "Well, if you like that sort of thing..." bands. Some dig 'em, but some like going to the dentist, too. It doesn't make it a recommendable experience.

Ugly Americans
Stereophonic Spanish Fly
Mercury

After years of impressing inebriated students on the college-club circuit, the Austin, Texas, band proves it can also rock sober ears with its major-label debut. Stereophonic Spanish Fly, a collection of the songs that consistently provoked the most head-nodding and dancing at their shows, showcases the band's talent for providing tight party rock with a little something for everyone.

Chameleonic vocalist Bob Schneider leads the cheerful sextet in demonstrating a range of rock styles from grunge ("White is the Wine") to pop ("You Turn Me On") to funk ("Vulcan Death Grip") to bluesy power ballad ("Find Me") — all while staying rooted in their own Ugly sound.

Lyric-wise, some of Schneider's lines should have been saved for the starry-eyed coeds ("You drive me crazy, when you whisper to me, you know I love you baby"), but most serve adequately, and a few even have a bona-fide star quality to them.

Sex music. Some like Prince, others prefer the ambiance of Sade. Whoever graces your CD during those Taster's Choice nights, chances are they're not British. But two new releases from English bands might change that. Morcheeba and Marden Hill's new releases provide groovy backdrops for those bedroom/fireside/kitchen floor encounters when not just any CD will do.

Morcheeba is a funkadelic trio led by British vocalist Skye Edwards, whose sensual crooning is laid across jazzy riffs. And Hijacked is an acid-jazz disc that'll bring out the soul in even the most stoic of lovers. Hijacked is short on lyrics and heavy on bassy rhythm. Perfect for getting in the mood.

Hot
Mammoth

Swing is back, and the Squirrel Nut Zippers are leading the resurgence with their reinvented jazz sounds. The six-member band resurrects the ghosts of a 1920s Louisiana speakeasy or a lavish party at Jay Gatsby's. From saxophones, clarinets and the string bass to the banjo, fiddle and baritone ukulele, the Zippers are swanky, never stale.

Modern Rock 1986-88: Hang The DJ
Rhino

We may all live in an alternative nation now, but modern rock's founding fathers were quarantined to the small state of college radio, fanzines and 120 minutes. These three volumes are a great start at chronicling some of the genre's most influential bands, like R.E.M., X, New Order, the Smiths and Jane's Addiction, as well as some lesser-knowns like Guadalcanal Diary and Transvision Vamp. Even if you don't recognize the names, you'll know the words, and a sing-a-long will ensue.

Various Artists
Andean Legacy
Narada

If we said you could plan a trip to South America's Andes for only $15, would you believe us? It's no joke — this CD is almost as good as being there to hear the traditional music of Peru, Chile, Ecuador and Bolivia's mountain villages. This collection of 14 instrumental and spiritual pieces is bound to make the mortal — and immortal — dance.

After years of listening to Barry Manilow, the Beach Boys and Debbie Gibson, assistant editors Amos, Jamis, Mel and Bell have finally acquired some taste.

Reel

BY MELISSA GREGO

LOVE AND MARRIAGE. LOVE AND marriage. Go together like a horse and carriage. This I tell ya, brother — you can't have one without the other… unless you see a movie. This month, film's all about family — there's spouse-endorsed adultery, a refusal to pay ransom for one's only son, and a husband's lifelong lies to his wife about his feelings toward Nazis. Bob Dole could have a full-course meal on these meaty Hollywood efforts to define the American family.

Breaking the Waves

October Films

She's damned if she does it and damned if she doesn't. British stage actress Emily Watson plays an impressionable girl from a religious, Scottish town who marries outsider Stellan Skarsgard (The Hunt for Red October). When an accident paralyzes Skarsgard, he convinces Watson to have sex with other men — since the only thing keeping him alive is the memory of making love to her.

Mother Night

Fine Line

This adaptation of Kurt Vonnegut's satirical novel intertwines guilt, responsibility, justice and heroism. Nick Nolte stars as an American playwright/free-lance American spy living in Berlin during World War II. In order to serve his country, he gets cozy with Nazi heavyweights. In the process, he learns how fleeting trust — of his lover, friends, government and himself — can be.

Michael Collins

Warner Bros.

Michael Collins is an immortal Irish hero. When he survived the Easter Uprising, Ireland's revolt against Britain, he injected life into the Irish revolution. Liam Neeson (Schindler's List) as Collins, Aidan Quinn (Legends of the Fall), Stephen Rea (The Crying Game) and Alan Rickman (Sense and Sensibility) struggle through complicated friendships and secret ploys as they change the shape of their nation's future.

Space Jam

Warner Bros.

What's up, Doc? Michael Jordan makes his film debut as he alley oops Bugs Bunny, new Looney Tune Lola Bunny and other Saturday-morning-with-cereal favorites. They star together in this wise-cracking action-adventure. NBA greats — all playing themselves — join Jordan for a futuristic journey into comedy, state-of-the-art computer effects and three-dimensional animation.

Ransom

Buena Vista

Mel Gibson (Braveheart) plays a New York tycoon who has it all — a beautiful wife, a thriving multi-million-dollar business and America's cutest son. But when kidnappers snatch his kid, Mr. Moneybags refuses to let go of what's his. Horrifying his wife, played by Rene Russo (Tin Cup), he counters the kidnappers' threats rather than paying out. Dodging, diving and chasing ensue.

Unhook the Stars

Miramax

A mother's work is never done. Gena Rowlands (Crazy in Love) has time on her hands since her kids moved out, so she's ready when her neighbor's 6-year-old needs help. Marisa Tomei (The Perez Family) is the single mom who leaves her son with Rowlands to take on a double shift. When Tomei's luck changes and the little lad can go home, Rowlands discovers she's done some growing up herself.

The Crucible

20th Century Fox

C'mon, if you were sexually repressed and obsessed with married farmers, you'd dance naked in the woods, too. Besides, Winona Ryder focuses her affections on Daniel Day-Lewis — can you blame her? Lies, guilt and the devil are all conjured up in this classic Salem witch-hunt tale adapted from Arthur Miller's stage play.

Star Trek: First Contact

Paramount

The story spans 40 books, seven movies, three TV series and more than two decades — but who's counting? The Next Generation crew is back for its second outing on the big screen. Patrick Stewart returns as captain of the Enterprise, but this time, the crew battles a huge mass of alienated outcasts who all dress, look and talk alike. No, they're not Trekkies, but the insidious Borg.

Jingle All The Way

20th Century Fox

There's an Ah-nuld movie for every season, and this time he's a hard-working businessman with kids — who knew? It's Christmas, and Schwarzenegger must find his kids the coolest gift on the block: Turbo Man. Man, yuletide shopping's not as easy as it used to be.

Dear God

Paramount

Look out — Hollywood's got Greg Kinnear going postal. He plays a con artist who has lost his inspiration to create dazzling schemes of deception and thievery. So, naturally, he takes a job in the soothing environment of a post office, where he's sent to work with the other cynics in the Dead Letter Office. Here, Kinnear finds hope for his illustrious career when he sets his sights higher than ever.

I'm Not Rappaport

Gramercy

With age comes wisdom… and senility and gout. But Walter Matthau (Grumpier Old Men) and Ossie Davis (who starred in the hit Broadway version of the film) won't let age cramp their wild Central Park lifestyles. So they sit on a park bench, tooting — their horns, that is — and trying to make sense and fun of the people around them.

Albino Alligator

Miramax

One minute the patrons of a small Southern bar are minding their own whiskey — the next thing they know, they're being held hostage by the perps of a botched robbery. Snipers, camera crews and hostage negotiators complete this cat-and-mouse directorial debut by Oscar-winner Kevin Spacey.

Hype! and Not Bad for a Girl

"If people are sick of the Seattle music scene, this movie is for them," says Hype! director Doug Pray.

Hype!* chronicles the grunge phenomenon by capturing live performances and interviews with Seattle bands, including little-known local acts and giants like Nirvana.

"Our intention from the beginning was not to make a grunge-rock concert film," producer Steve Helvey says. "It's about what happens when money is suddenly injected into a culture."

Dr. Lisa Apramian's Not Bad for a Girl also hits theaters in November. Featuring female rockers from Hole, L7, Babes in Toyland and Lunachicks, Not Bad shows why some women grow up wanting to be Mick Jagger — not date him.

Dr. Lisa (as her patients call her) produced Not Bad on a miniscule budget — she spent about $15 on indoor floodlights for the set. But she says it's worth a look. "I mean a shrink talking to musicians is kind of an interesting concept, don't you think?"

Check out our full-length interviews with these filmmakers on the U. web site:* http://www.umagazine.com.

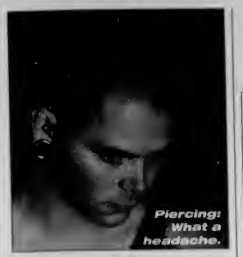
The Reel Deal

Black Circle Boys



Only Hollywood could turn a former member of New Kids on the Block into a drug-dealing, Satan-worshipping pedophile and get away with it. Donnie Wahlberg, ex-teen idol, plays an occult ritual master in this coming-of-age thriller to be released next year.

Black Circle Boys* follows the plight of Kyle, an impressionable all-American guy who moves to Seattle. Kyle (Scott Bairstow, White Fang 2) is drawn into a morass of illegal substances and evil after meeting Shane, leader of the Black Circle Boys cult.

Eric Mabius (I Shot Andy Warhol) plays Shane. "[Shane] is a cross between Jim Jones and Mick Jagger," says producer Lysa Hayland on the set in Seattle. But she says, "[They're] a bunch of slackers who can't even tie their own shoelaces, much less worship Satan properly."

Director Matthew Carnahan (The Mailman) says he wrote the screenplay with Seattle's gloominess in mind. The results were more than gloomy. During one night of shooting in a graveyard, some of the crew wore garlic necklaces. Local actor Chad Lindberg, who plays the pathetically lost Rory, noted, "This is kinda creepy. Digging in graves is certainly not the kind of thing I would normally do." Lindberg, a last-minute addition to the cast, is enjoying his first leading role. "I went from pushing grocery carts three weeks ago to saying, 'I'd like Pringles in my room, please,' and voilà! They appear!"

Metal Heads

YOU STUD. YOU HARD, LITTLE stud. I want to screw you on my head. Yes, I do. Because I love seeing you there.

Wait — we're talking implants here. Scalp implants, to be exact. You know, detachable metal studs screwed through your scalp into a metal plate implanted under your skin.

"The procedure involves slitting your scalp and shoving a threaded metal plate in there," says Crystal, a professional piercer from Primeval Body Piercing Studio in Hollywood.

Ouch. The screw-on studs are also interchangeable with other attachments, from small beads to 4-inch spikes — essentially turning your noggin into a Gen X Mr. Potato Head.

Could this be the next logical step for modern primitives following tattoos, piercing, branding and implanting beads under the penis skin? The Association of Professional Piercers says no.

"This is illegal surgery," says APP's Michaela Grey. "Body piercers have no business doing anything but body piercing."

Grey says that injecting anesthetics into the scalp could accidentally anesthetize the brain and cause death. Implants can also result in a fatal brain infection or long-term degenerative damage to connective tissues.

So far only one soul, Joe Aylward, a piercer's apprentice in Phoenix, has had the procedure. Aylward's piercing mentor performed the operation and the duo have defended scalp implants in Newsweek, on talk shows and on TV news broadcasts.

"If they kept it private, that's one thing, but exploiting it the way they are might give people ideas," Crystal says. "Like the kids who don't have any money, so they pierce themselves."

But scalp spikes might only be the tip of the trend. A Jim Rose circus member is having coral horns implanted in his scalp. Other piercers are hearing rumors of spine implants. Will the madness stop before American youth become refugees from a Clive Barker film?

"I'd be very sorry to see this one person and his bad idea become a trend," Grey says. "He's been very lucky not to have been killed."

So if you think scalp implants sound cool, you better get your head examined.

ANOTHER ONE BITES THE DUST

BY DAMIAN SHAW
ARIZONA STATE U.
ILLUSTRATION BY GREG HARDIN, U. OF KANSAS

IT LURKS IN THE shadows and behind bushes at night. Beware: the relationship.

One year ago, I was in the early stages of dating my girlfriend, Jamie. I was the ultimate bachelor. Beer bottle collection, a pile of old pizza boxes on the floor and a black book full of girls' names and numbers.

That was then; this is now.

I now share an apartment with her, but there is nary a beer bottle or pizza box to be found, and my black book gathers dust. Instead of recovering from a hangover on Saturday morning, I'm at the mall. On a bench. Holding a purse.

Oh, how the mighty have fallen.

I don't want to give the impression that having a girlfriend is all bad. After all, don't we all wind up in a relationship at one time or another? Jamie treats me well and I love her, but it's certainly a change. And that's an understatement.

The nights of sticking beer bottle caps to the ceiling have been replaced by days of neatly hanging art that we "both agree on." As long as she likes it.

Out: Monday night football. In: Melrose Place. Out: Dinner at Hooters. In: Sunday dinner with her mother. Out: All parties at which the police show up. In: Renting Don Juan de Marco. Out: Picking up department store salesgirls. In: Shopping at Contempo. Out: Working marathon hours. In: "I'm on my way home right now, honey." Out: Being a slob. In: Cleaning up after myself.

In the process of living together and creating a union, I've also lost my own identity. I am no longer just Damian. I have morphed into someone called "Jamie-and-Damian." We are one. Even my mom finishes her messages on the answering machine with, "I love you guys."

On the positive side, I am improving as an individual. It seems I've been insensitive to people all my life. Who would have known? Thank goodness my girlfriend has shown me the error of my ways. Sometimes I would go places and not invite her. I should have known she would want to go to the shooting range. What was I thinking?

Besides all of this, I am happy that I have left the single life behind. Lots of great womanizers have fallen under the spell of just one woman. In recent history, even Warren Beatty has become a one-woman man.

A relationship isn't a curse; it's a blessing. I get three square meals a day, I have a balanced budget and, most importantly, I have someone who loves me. What can I say? I, er, I mean we, have never been happier.

Damian Shaw may cater to his one woman's every whim, but he's not whipped. No sir. Uh uh. Not Damian.

Double Take

You know the old saying, "When in Rome..."? Well, thanks to the International Students' Guide To The U.S.A., foreign students can assimilate into that bizarre and mysterious American student subculture with little effort. These are the brilliant nuggets of wisdom the book offers:

Greetings
"For hello, [young Americans] prefer hi, hey, howdy, what's up?, what's new?, what's cooking and what's shakin'?"
"For a casual goodbye, variations include: so long, let's go, take it easy and we're outta here (outta = out of)."

Making friends
"This recipe is guaranteed to make you popular with other students: chocolate chip cookies."

Vocabulary
"To space: To forget something. Sorry, man. I totally spaced."

Food
"Eating in a cafeteria can be an important time to socialize as well as eat. Of course, no student would survive without eating pizza at least several times a week."

Yeltsin left worried after Russian elections

MOSCOW (AP) — Elections in Russia's provinces over the weekend brought mixed results for President Boris Yeltsin, whose appointees won some races in early returns Monday but were losing others to hard-liners.

The regional elections, held throughout the fall, could significantly alter the makeup of parliament's upper house, the 178-member Federation Council. The body consists of regional governors, most of whom used to be handpicked by the president but who now must be elected.

The government has tried hard to support the incumbents, but the victories so far have been split evenly between them and the Communists and other hard-liners. In the most dramatic slap to Yeltsin, his rebellious former vice president, Alexander Rutskoi, was elected governor a week ago in the southern Kursk province. Last weekend, Ravil Geniatulin, governor of the Chita region in eastern Siberia, won re-election, as did Alexander Philipenko, head of the northern Khanty-Mansiysk autonomous district, Russian news reports said.

Weld, Kerry square off in final debate

BOSTON (AP) — U.S. Sen. John Kerry and Republican Gov. William F. Weld closed their six-month series of debates Monday with familiar remarks, echoing their many earlier splits on crime, welfare and tax policy.

The Senate candidates stuck to familiar litanies of accomplishments as their eighth debate came off in an especially charged environment — a week until Election Day, polls showing them deadlocked, and more than 10 percent of the voters still undecided.

In a race between two popular incumbents, and one longing for controversy, moderator Ken Bode pressed Kerry early on with questions about reports of some free living arrangements and a car temporarily provided for him by wealthy supporters.

When Kerry tried to steer the discussion to other areas, the moderator persisted, asking Kerry if he thought he had done anything wrong.

"Do I think I did anything wrong? No," he said. "I should have stayed at my brother-in-law's longer."

"You did take a free car for 16 months without paying for it," Weld said. The issue was relevant, Weld said, because Kerry wanted to increase other people's bills through higher taxes and might have second thoughts "if he had to pay all his own bills." Both responses brought oohs and ahhs from the capacity crowd at historic Faneuil Hall.

Weld, the state's two-term governor, was put on the defensive over campaign spending.

Olver seeks UMass vote

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

The race for the First Congressional District of the United States House of Representatives between incumbent John Olver (D-Amherst) and state Senator Jane Swift (R-North Adams) is entering the final week before the election.

To garner favorable opinion from the more than 8,000 student voters at the University of Massachusetts, Rep. Olver attended a forum hosted by the Jason Vecchio, the student coordinator of the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

In the forum, held at the Union Video Center (Ch. 19) studios in the Student Union Building, Rep. Olver addressed student concerns on the current state of education in Massachusetts and in the country.

Rep. Olver took the opportunity to voice his disapproval of Republican policies and to let students know his record on education.

Unlike Republicans, Olver believes that the U.S. Department of Education should not be eliminated because it serves an important role in providing special education and needs.

"The federal role of education should be one of making certain that there is equal educational opportunity," said Olver. "It seems to me critically important that there be standards on a national level."

He added, "in this global economy that we are working in and with the mobility that goes on even in this country, you really ought to try to make certain that education in Mississippi and in Montana and in Massachusetts are all relatively equivalent... to be able to compete [in the economy]."

Olver said that the three most important issues facing college students are financial aid, lack of state and federal investment in universities, and an lack of investment in research and development.

According to Olver, the University has lacked in providing adequate research facilities for the students enrolled in the humanities and social sciences.

He said that the W.E.B. Du Bois Library has fallen from its status among the top 25 University libraries in his time as state Senator.

"There could be federal input [as well as state] in new technologies and new scientific advances making certain that campuses stay up to date," said Olver, referring to outdated equipment and facilities at the University.

Olver said also that students should be able to get low interest loans and grants for equal educational access.

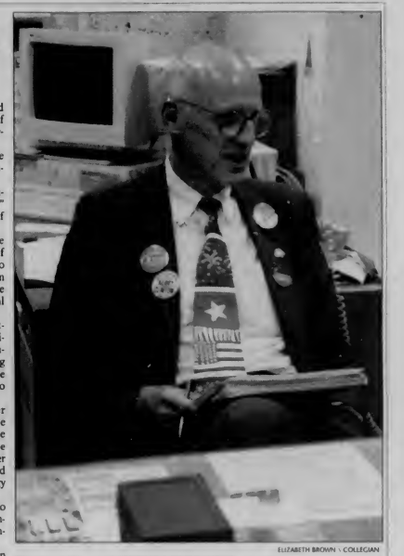
"If we are going to provide equal educational access... It has go with some opportunity for people to go to college without ending up going so deeply into debt," said Olver.

He added, "I have always been a strong proponent of financial aid."

Olver said that he is convinced that students can get more loans if the "middle man" is removed, referring to banks.

According to Olver, the "middle man" is taking money away from students who take out loans.

A student from the studio audience asked Olver if the "middle man" could be the Department of Education.



In response, Olver said that the elimination of the Department of Education would be disastrous to those children who benefit from programs such as Head Start, safe and drug free schools and financial aid.

"[If the Department was eliminated] then what you have done is eliminated the one place where equal educational opportunity... giving American children whether they be black or white or brown to be able to become successful," Olver said.

Before entering politics, Olver was a chemistry professor at the University. He served as state Senator before replacing the late Silvio O. Conte. Olver is a member of the House Budget Committee and the Subcommittees on Basic Energy and Environment.

The forum is the second of a two part series that featured the two candidates for the seat for the first congressional district.

The forums will be broadcast on the Union Video Channel before the elections on Nov. 5.

Hungry & homeless helped by MassPIRG

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Faced with increased homelessness and poverty among children, MassPIRG has initiated a major campaign to address these issues on campus.

According to the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness, the United States could easily end hunger and homelessness if "we prioritize it as a society."

MassPIRG has these intentions in mind. Amanprit Kandola, campaign coordinator for MassPIRG, said there are two main goals to this project, to raise awareness and funds for homelessness and hunger.

MassPIRG has many events planned for their campaign as well as encouraging students to volunteer at soup kitchens, food pantries and homeless shelters in the Amherst area.

"Students learn through volunteering, it's hands on experience, you get to see the immediate effects of your work," said Kandola, a sophomore psychology major.

"For me, it's socially gratifying. I know that I am making a difference. It's such a good feeling to know that I am fighting this problem," she said.

World Food Day officially kicked off the Hunger and Homelessness Campaign on Oct. 16. Hoping to increase students' awareness about these issues, a table was set-up on the Campus Center concourse offering literature and other informative sources.

"The table was meant to educate students about problems worldwide," said Kandola.

MassPIRG is currently holding a Food and Clothes Drive in many academic buildings. Students can feel free to drop off canned food or unwanted clothing in the designated boxes.

A Quarter Drive was conducted in all the dining commons last week. Senior Ebony Anderson organized the drive by placing flyers and cans in the dining commons. A total of $381.03 was raised in the four day fund-raiser.

The money raised from the Quarter Drive will be donated to the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts. The Food Bank helps support many local soup kitchens, food pantries and homeless shelters throughout the four counties in the western part of the state.

The main focus of the campaign is "Make a Difference Week," running Nov. 17-23.

On Nov. 20, Food Services will assist MassPIRG in holding the Skip-A-Meal fund raiser.

"So many students skip meals every day," said Kandola, "so it makes sense to have that food donated."

For every meal that is skipped, Food Services will donate $1.50 to Oxfam. Last year, this program raised $800. Oxfam is an international organization that helps poor people build long term food and economic security. Oxfam workers help the poor gain access to basic resources in order for them to be self-sufficient, according to the organization.

A Hunger Banquet will also be held on Nov. 20 from 6 -9 p.m. Tickets are $3 per person, and the money raised will be donated to Oxfam.

"If people participate in the Skip-A-Meal program, then hopefully they will attend the banquet so they can eat dinner," said Sophomore Veronica MacDonald, organizer of the banquet.

Banquet participants will be divided into three groups; 15% will be the elite, 25% will be the middle class and the remaining 60% will represent the poor.

"The meals will go accordingly. The elite will have a good size meal while the poor won't have much to eat, except rice," said MacDonald, "we want to show the inequality of society and raise awareness."

"I think a lot of people get wrapped in their own lives and they don't recognize the needs of others or that their way of life isn't the only way," said MacDonald, a psychology and anthropology double-major.

Employees of local shelters will be among the expert speakers at the banquet as well as a few musicians.

Local Amherst restaurants, Beuno y Sano, Amber Waves and the Pub will be donating the food.

"The dinner shows the changes from one class to another and the different levels and aspects of being a part of one class versus being apart of a different class," said Kandola.

$200 was raised at last year's Banquet. The money will be donated to Oxfam as well.

Also to be held during the Make a Difference Week is the sleepout on Nov 22. Each participant will be asked to get people to sponsor them for the number of hours they spend outside. Participants will sleep on card board boxes and have only what blankets they bring.

"It's a reality that many homeless people have to face," she said. "It's a great awareness program. Many students do not realize what the homeless go through."

Kandola also said that getting involved with these activities helps the relationship between college student and community members.

"So many people assume that college students don't want to get involved if it doesn't directly effect them. This is not the case. It's so important to get involved in the community and the environment in which we live. Students need to have a good working relationship with their community," said Kandola.

ACLU head discusses censorship warns of Decency Amendment

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Staff

American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) president and out spoken defender of First Amendment Rights, Nadine Strossen spoke last night as a guest of the Distinguished Visitors Program. The lecture entitled "Censorship on the Internet" was held at Bowker Auditorium

Strossen, a magna cum laude graduate of Harvard, and the youngest and first female president of the ACLU, addressed the crowd stating "my topic tonight is the newest challenges we face in communication," specifically censorship on the Internet.

She began by giving historical reference of the "massive explosion in cyber communication." In 1981 fewer than 300 users were linked to the Internet in the world, today there are almost 10 million, in total there are almost 40 million Internet users, stated Strossen.

This explosion, which in the last year has resulted in an "abundance of legal material involving cyber liberties," gave way to the development of the ACLU Task Force on cyber liberties. Cyber liberties, a term Strossen stated coined by the ACLU "revolves around the fundamental right of free speech."

Wasting no time Strossen immediately dove into the case currently involving the ACLU, Reno v. ACLU. The case marks the "first cyber liberties issue to reach our highest court." The Communication Decency Amendment (CDA), was passed in February by Congress "outlaws anything indecent or patently offensive."

Strossen and the ACLU oppose this act because of the "vague expansive conflicts that may apply to any expression that government may not agree with." Several examples stated by Strossen, of past communication stated modes attempted to be censored included radio, movies, television and even the telephone which one noted psychiatrist accused the phone of driving people insane.

"Expanded communication opposition has always frightened those who have a more authoritarian viewpoint," stated Strossen. She continued to state how new media has always been responsible for social problems including television which many viewed responsible for sex, crime, alienation, isolation, commercialization, bad manners and bad attitude.

Outlining the CDA, Strossen stated that it "outlaws more than obscenity," including any on-line discussion about abortion and extending to e-mail, giving incentive for employers to snoop to see if messages contain any indecent language extending to love letters.

"I believe that the net should be free from any government restriction on expression," said Strossen, but "I do not oppose certain narrow restrictions. I agree with the Supreme Court if it poses a clear and present danger of actual or imminent harm."

Strossen stated her firm belief not in censoring, but counter-speech as a "very powerful option." To illustrate her point Strossen described an e-mail incident that occurred at Cornell University, where several male students compiled a list of "fifty reasons why women should not have freedom of speech."

The e-mail contained "very sexist expressions," according to Strossen, but Cornell decided not to punish the students. Counter-speech is "not just a cliche of civil libertarians, but is realistically available and effective," said Strossen.

Strossen continued to advocate the ACLU and its fight against the CDA. The ACLU represents many groups that may be affected by the support of the CDA by the Supreme Court including Planned Parenthood, the AIDS survival project, Human Rights Watch and many other groups that provide material that "will be considered indecent and offensive," said Strossen.

"Government officials can act in arbitrary and at worst discriminatory ways," said Strossen referring to the America On-Line censorship of the word breast. "The word breast was excluded from chat rooms. There were protests from people who wanted to talk about breast cancer, breast feeding or how to cook a chicken breast," commented Strossen with laughter from the crowd.

"Laugh at this, but this is a preview if worst comes to worst," said Strossen referring movie titles censored on the

Red Cross looks for UMass' blood

By T.J. Kelly
Collegian Correspondent

The American Red Cross, is continuing to sponsor a series of blood drives within the Five–College area and is depending of University of Massachusetts students to donate.

College and high school students supply the local chapter with 30% of the total blood received. UMass averages 43 drives annually.

According to Donna Kuhla, a donor recruitment specialist from the local chapter, "only five percent of eligible people actually donate blood. In central and northern New England, 320,000 units of blood are collected yearly and must be distributed to over 170 hospitals. A greater number of donors is the key to an abundance of blood in our hospitals."

Mary Snyder, Director of Emergency Services at the Hampshire County Chapter of The American Red Cross, said, "UMass is the single largest provider of blood in the northeast region of the United States."

She also said that blood supplies are lower in the fall due to summer vacation, when students are less likely to donate blood because they are away from school — making these blood drives crucial.

The representatives from several local blood donor organizations said they were thankful for the support UMass has provided in their efforts.

Circle K, a student volunteer organization, has played a major role in promoting these blood drives. Sue Andersen, a first–year member said she was optimistic toward these efforts.

"Many people have signed up to donate already and we expect a good amount of walk–in donors on the day of the drive," Andersen said.

UMass will be holding the next two blood drives in the Campus Center, October 29 from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. in room 168C and October 30, same times, in room 163C.

■ Hunger

Recently, MassPIRG conducted a food drive at local grocery stores for the Amherst Survival Center. Food drive participants asked shoppers to donate a can of food as they were leaving. A total of 38 pounds of food was collected.

The Amherst Survival Center is a non–profit organization that provides space for families and individuals who are struggling in today's economy. The Center donates food, clothing and household goods to the poor as well as offering support and informational services.

MassPIRG members are also trying to plan turkey dinners for families that can not afford them for the Thanksgiving holidays.

"Homelessness and hunger is such a large problem. We need to do our part to try to alleviate the problem," said Kandola.

■ ACLU

Internet and the chance of the Supreme Court passing the CDA.

"I am cautiously optimistic that the Supreme Court will secure a victory," said Strossen about the Reno v. ACLU. Strossen stated her reasons for optimism, "the Supreme Court has been quite good on free speech issues," and the, "Supreme Court has very limited authority to second guess factual findings of lower courts," where the ACLU was already victorious.

She sympathized with parents concerned with their children's upbringing resulting from exposure to undesired material, but stated that "cyberspace empowers parents to make individual choices," to shield their children from unwanted information.

Stossen commented briefly on minor's free speech rights. Recent examples of infringements of these rights included the "wave of teen curfews and the V chip," which Strossen said was an "increase of power of the government to interfere with our lives."

Questioning the fairness of government to censor minors Strossen stated, "123,000 college students are under 18 [and] there is something quite insulting" about sweeping everyone into one lump. If the CDA passed, much of the restricted information could prove to be life threatening to minors. All discussion of safe sex, contraception, and information about gay and lesbian issues would be prohibited.

In the question–and–answer period following her speech, Strossen was asked her stance on depictions of women in situations of rape or violence. Strossen responded by stating, "I believe censoring that kind of image would do more harm than good to women's rights. Some images might be positive to women's rights and safety."

Strossen cited the movie The Accused as an example of an "extremely disturbing," but a "very powerful condemnation" of rape and violence against women that "would actually strengthen laws."

Another audience member questioned the ability of far right groups, such as the Christian Coalition, and their ability to generate strong influence. Strossen responded by stating they are "effectively exercising their First Amendment Rights."
